PREFACE

The Dharmaśāstra ascribed to Bṛhaspati has long been recognised as one of the most important smṛtis, but it has remained a lost work, surviving only in quotations in commentaries and digests. Its value even in such citations was appreciated by lawyers and judges, and passages from Bṛhaspatismṛti have been quoted in judicial decisions. Dr. J. Jolly considered the fragments of Bṛhaspati as 'among the most precious relics in the early legal literature of India', partly from their intrinsic merit and interest and partly from 'their close connexion with the Code of Manu' which 'gives them a special claim to consideration, and renders them a valuable link in the chain of evidence by which the date of the most authoritative code of ancient India has been approximately determined'. He made for his own use a collection of passages from Bṛhaspati, which he was able to gather from a handful of commentaries and digests, and arranged them roughly in the order followed by Nāradasmṛti, which he had edited (Bibliotheca Indica, 1886) and translated (the smaller version in 1876, and the larger version, which he had edited, in 1889 in the Sacred Books of the East, vol. XXXIII). He did not print the text on which his translation was based. Dr. Jolly's translation dealt with about 700 verses of Bṛhaspati on law and procedure. In 1879, Dr. A. A. Führer published his doctoral dissertation on Bṛhaspati's treatment of written documents (lekhya), in proof of the existence of writing in ancient India. In this pamphlet he gathered, arranged and printed eighty-four ślokas ascribed to Bṛhaspati by Aparārka and a few other writers. While the fragments of Bṛhaspati thus remained unpublished, the closely associated work of Kātyāyana received attention. In 1927, about 800 verses of Kātyāyana were published by Mr. N. C. Bandopādhyāya under the auspices of the University of Calcutta. A fuller and annotated edition with a translation was published in 1933 by Mr. P. V. Kane, bearing the marks of the thoroughness and erudition, which characterise his work. It dealt also only with passages on vyavahāra, drew on twenty-one 'sources' only, and reproduced 973 verses ascribed in those works to Kātyāyana. Differences in reading were shown in footnotes and discussed occasionally, as needed.

A copy of the reconstruction of Kātyāyana was given to me by Mr. Kane when I first met him in Bombay in April, 1934. My first reaction was to ask why he had not attempted a similar reconstruction of Bṛhaspati. Mr. Kane, after a short discussion, urged me to undertake the work, as his own time was pre-engaged. The next day I was honoured by an audience of His Highness the Mahārāja Sir Sayāji Rao Gaekwad of Baroda, at which the suggestion was made that I should edit some works for the Gaekwad's Oriental Series. An offer to edit the fragments of Bṛhaspati, and, if the manuscript of it in the Palace Library at Udaipur (Mewar) could be secured, the Kṛtyakalpataru of Lakṣmīdhara, the oldest authoritative digest of Dharmaśāstra, which has survived almost entire, received the gracious approval of His Highness. The Prime Minister of Baroda, Sir V. T. Krishnamachari, K.C.I.E., who was present at the interview, was requested to get me the requisite facilities. The interest manifested by His Highness and the readiness and warmth with which all my requests for help have been complied with by the Prime Minister and Dr. B. Bhattacharyya, the learned Director of the Baroda Oriental Institute, have burdened me with a feeling of responsibility, which has not been light. The ideal which I set before myself was to examine as many secondary works as possible for fragments of the lost smṛti, and collect not only passages dealing with law and procedure, but with such topics as ācāra and prāyasccitta, which must have been deemed by Bṛhaspati, as by every author of a Dharmasamhitā, as not less important. The view now common that vyavahāra is the only relevant part of a smṛti is one which reflects a partial and one-sided view of our smṛtis and an implicit belief in the existence of a distinction between things secular and things spiritual or non-secular in our ancient literature, which is opposed to facts and to the basic concepts of the Indian view of life. The collection and publication of vyavahāra fragments alone of lost smṛtis, while perhaps forensically useful, perpetuates the erroneous view of the character and content of a typical smṛti and of the entire background of the ancient literature dealing with trivarga.

The task undertaken was a heavy one. That it did not discourage even a beginning was perhaps due to the optimism engendered by my having taken leave preparatory to retirement and the expectation that a life of leisure was before me from 1934. But, after the work of collecting fragments was begun, the Principalship of the Central Hindu College in the Benares Hindu University and the teaching duties of a University Professor devolved on me. During the three years from July, 1935, in which I remained in Benares, the work on Bṛhaspati and the Kṛtyakalpataru, besides that of editing Varadarāja's Vyavahāranirṇaya, was steadily pursued to the point of complete absorption of my scanty leisure. Ordinarily, such multiple studies would impede progress in all directions. But, since the main task was to find every available fragment attributed to Bṛhaspati, the widening of the area of investigation helped and did not hinder the reconstruction. Though Kāśī is not what it was, it still affords in its great manuscript collections unique facilities for the study of almost every branch of our old literature, while there are still a few paṇḍitas there who worthily maintain the fame of Kāśī as the spiritual centre of India.

How far an approach has been made to the ideal may be judged from the reconstruction now published. Nearly two hundred 'sources' are named in the footnotes, which give every individual variation in a śloka of Bṛhaspati printed in the body of the book. The number refers only to the books actually cited as source of verse or variant reading. Hundreds of works in print and manuscript were examined, without yielding any śloka of Bṛhaspati. They too will enter in any evalution of the labour involved. The net has not till now been thrown over so wide an area. The literature of Dharmaśāstra (even in its present reduced dimensions) is so vast that no single life can hope to cover it. Fortunately, several major works, which were unpublished when Jolly and Führer wrote, are now available in print. But most of the great digests are either unpublished or have been only partially published. The great series of Caṇḍeśvara and Mitramiśra appear still as torsos. The unprinted parts of such series as the Ratnākara, Nṛsimhaprasāda and the Vīramitrodaya, along with series still awaiting publication like the Madanodyota and the Ṭoḍarānanda, can be consulted only in badly preserved and badly written manuscripts. Two windfalls merit mention. South India, which did not have to face the familiar vicissitudes of a Musalman conquest, has long preserved not only many works lost in Hindusthan, but has preserved older forms of the texts of many works which survive elsewhere in imperfect recensions. Varadarāja's Vyavahāranirṇaya, which competed for the employment of my leisure with Bṛhaspati and the Kṛtyakalpataru, presents many fragments, not only of Bṛhaspati but of Kātyāyana, which are unavailable in North Indian digests of the Musalman period. It was possible to add from this single source 121 verses to the 973 collected by Mr. Kane as Kātyāyana's, on vyavahāra alone. Further, this work has helped a decision on the authenticity of some passages ascribed to Bṛhaspati, as will be seen from the Introduction and the Notes. The second windfall was the Kṛtyakalpataru, which I have shown as composed about A.D. 1110, before the famous Mitākṣarā, which it rivals in the opulence of its citations, as it has long done in admitted authority. Among extant works only Viśvarūpa's great bhāṣya on Yājñavalkyasmṛti and Medhātithi's still more famous bhāṣya on Manusmṛti, both of which belong probably to the ninth century A.D., are older than the Kṛtyakalpataru. The age of a source is a relevant factor in deciding upon the authenticity of both citation and reading.

The help rendered by Lakṣmīdhara's work in both respects is difficult to exaggerate.

In the result, in the pesent collection of fragments of the lost code, nibandhas and commentaries of eleven centuries have been laid under contribution. Variants are given from early as well as comparatively late 'sources'. It is pertinent to ask 'What is the need for examining and reproducing readings from recent works, if the source of the selected śloka can be traced to an early writer?' The answer and defence of the practice involve a reference to the peculiar conditions of the preservation of ancient works in India. Oral teaching, which was the backbone of ancient Indian education, still survives. The sūtra and the śloka were devices evolved to meet the needs of oral transmission of knowledge. Their purpose is forgotten. Even after books came to be written their influence, as compared with that of oral teaching, in the guru-śiṣya system was relatively small. A written commentary could not give everything that can be said orally. Reliance on a book for elucidation was therefore held as likely not only to mislead but to convey wrong impressions of authentic doctrine. This is why we find in smṛti literature, even in ages in which documents and writings came to be the mainstay of judicial decisions, denunciations of dependence on books, side by side with praise of gifts of purāṇas as among the donations of most sanctity. Devaṇṇa Bhaṭṭa (thirteenth century) quotes the authority of Nārada for including dependence on books along with women, gambling, addiction to the stage, idleness and sleep among the impediments to the acquisition of knowledge. Mādhava also quotes Nārada to show that 'what is learned from books, and not from the teacher, will not shine in an assembly of the learned'. The familiar denunciation of the sale (vikraya) of knowledge is aimed as much at teaching under contract for a fee as at the sale of books which would supersede the teacher. The results of the prejudice were twofold: first, improvement of the memory to make its retentiveness greater; and secondly, to make citation in books aim at the utmost accuracy to escape the familiar charge. Quotations in our Dharmaśāstra literature, which are usually attributed to astonishing feats of memory, were in reality taken from manuscripts. Scholars, even the greatest, preferred to transcribe their own manuscripts. The practice is not extinct. The vogue of the professional scribe came later. It is thus possible that good readings may descend in an unbroken succession of scholarly transcripts and be preserved in a comparatively modern digest, while bad readings may be due to the interposition of the paid copyist. There is an element of chance in the survival of both books and correct readings, for which allowance must be made.

No attempt has been made to find out in the case of every śloka in this collection its authentic original form. With the apparatus provided in the footnotes, the discovery is not beyond possibility, but limitations of time, in the collection which had already taken some years, made it imperative that this huge but valuable work should be deferred in a pioneer attempt. As the work was done far from completely equipped libraries, and depending on chance finds of sources, it has not been possible to adhere closely to an original scheme of arranging the footnotes in chronological order. But, now that the dates of most secondary works at least are known more or less correctly, this failure may not mean much loss. The discovery of additional texts or of omissions due to chance has necessitated an Appendix of additional quotations (pp. 493–499) and another of 'additions to the footnotes' covering thirty-five pages (pp. 502–536). Several of the additional notes were suggested by the magnificent digest of Dharmaśāstra now under preparation and publication by the Prajñā-Pāṭha-śālā of Wāi, whose first volume came out after the text was printed.

An explanation of the arrangement of the collected fragments has to be given. They are arranged in seven parts: (1) Vyavahāra (pp. 1–228) arranged as twenty-nine chapters with intervening subject headings, (2) Samskāra (pp. 231–308), (3) Ācāra (pp. 309–325), (4) Śrāddha (pp. 326–351), (5) Āśauca (pp. 352–364), (6) Āpad-dharma (pp. 365–372), and (7) Prāyasccitta (pp. 373–386). This is perhaps not the order in which the topics of the original Bṛhaspatismṛti were arranged. We have no means of ascertaining its order. The close connection between Manu's work and Bṛhaspati's might suggest that the order of topics in the work of the latter followed that in Manusmṛti. Though there is a rough scheme of distribution in Manu's work, it cannot be described as logical, as the same topics are often dealt with in different parts of the smṛti. To some extent this is natural. A subject like marriage for instance can be brought under Samskāra or Vyavahāra. In Indian theory, this life is only a link in a chain of existences, through which the soul makes its transit in accordance with its karma. Offences have to be expiated in order that the coils of karma might not pull down the soul. Punishment (Daṇḍa) purifies, and the wise man who has offended will not seek to escape the appointed penalty for his offence but meet it voluntarily. For every offence there is both a civil penalty and a purification, and without both, one is not absolved from the effects of the offence. An offence like seduction will thus come under crime in Vyavahāra and also recur in Prāyasccitta. A certain amount of repetition and overlapping inevitably follows. Ordinarily, the treatment of Vyavahāra follows Samskāra, and Ācāra sometimes is grouped with Samskāra and sometimes with Prāyasccitta. The duties of the king, for example, are treated by Yājñavalkya under Ācāra. Within a section the arrangement is indicated by the traditional classifications of Samskāras as sixteen and of the titles of Vyavahāra as eighteen. Occupations, normal and exceptional, are brought by Manu under the duties of the castes (ācāra), under penance (prāyasccitta), under mixed marriages, and under punishment, as the king has the duty to punish those who follow forbidden occupations. The arrangement of topics in the Dharmasūtras is even more confused. Accordingly, what has been attempted in this collection is an arrangement under topics, which will enable all the dicta of Bṛhaspati on one subject to be studied together. The grouping is dictated by convenience, not by conjecture of the original order of treatment in the lost smṛti. Vyavahāra is placed first, not because it is conceded that its author is different from the author of the other sections, but because it has now an attraction to lawyers. Even in this section, the arrangement of verses is not identical with that followed by Jolly, who arbitrarily imitated the order in Nārada. As Jolly's translation holds the field, a comparative statement of verses translated by Jolly and reproduced in this collection is furnished for convenience of reference (pp. 537–546).

A very full index is appended (pp. 387–492). For Vyavahāra the index is of quarter-verses, and for the other six sections of half-verses. The labour expended on the preparation of the index will be appreciated by those who have suffered from the un-indexed condition of the greater part of the published smṛti literature. Such an index is an essential prerequisite of comparative study.

As regards the text, no attempt has been made to correct passages, which seemed to offend against grammar, especially where the manuscripts confirm the same text.

It remains to acknowledge with gratitude the help which has been received in the preparation and publication of this reconstruction of Bṛhaspati's teachings. In the collection of the books and manuscripts needed, my obligations are heavy to the custodians of several libraries, and to Sir V. T. Krishnamachari and Dr. Bhattacharyya, who have responded with promptness and generosity to all applications for help. Mahāmahopādhyāya Pandit Gopināth Kavirāj, M.A., and his successor Dr. Mangaldev Shastri, M.A., D.Phil., placed at my disposal the manuscript treasures and printed books in the Sarasvatibhavan at Benares. Mahāmahopādhyāya Dr. Sir Gangānāth Jhā, M.A., D.Litt., lent me two manuscripts. Rai Govindachandra, M.A., of Benares allowed me to borrow manuscripts from the Mālatī-śāradā-bhavan founded by his father. The Council of the Royal Asiatic Society of Bengal, the authorities of the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute at Poona, and Professor P. P. S. Śāstri, M.A., Curator of the Government Oriental Manuscripts Library at Madras, allowed me to borrow manuscripts from their libraries. The most generous assistance of all was from Vaidyaratna Captain G. Śrīnivāsamūrty, B.A., B.L., M.B. & C.M., Director of the Adyar Library. He not only threw the Library open to me and allowed me to borrow manuscripts from it freely, but he arranged for transcripts of badly written manuscripts, which were required for leisurely consultation, to be made at the expense of (and for) the Adyar Library and then lent them to me.

In the compilation itself, my obligation is heaviest to my old pupil and assistant, Mr. A. N. Krishna Aiyangar, M.A., L.T., now of the Adyar Library, who has helped me at every stage of the work, contributed the comparative statement (pp. 537–546) and collaborated in the preparation of the index and the 'hunt' for Bṛhaspati ślokas. The preparation of the earlier cards under my direction, and of the press copy, was the work of Mīmāmsā-śiromaṇi S. Sankararāma Śāstri, now a paṇḍit in the Śrī Citrodaya Devapūjā-pāṭhaśālā at Tiruvella in Travancore. In the elucidation of difficult verses and in helping me with the reading of books and manuscripts written in Telugu, Grantha, Maithilī and Bengali characters, as well as proof correction, I have received help and guidance from Mahāmahopādhyāya Pandit A. Chinnaswāmi Śāstri, now Principal, College of Theology in the Benares Hindu University. Five years of intimate association in study with him is among my unforgettable memories. I owe thanks to Rao Bahadur Dr. S. K. Belvalkar, M.A., Ph.D., of Poona for a translation of Führer's pamphlet.

A few words are necessary to record my grateful appreciation of the uniform courtesy and consideration that I have received from the Baptist Mission Press, Calcutta, to which the printing was entrusted. Its scrupulous fidelity to instructions and its high standard are illustrated by many instances in which, after the proofs had been finally passed, printing was held up, because the scholarly Reader of the Press found errors which had escaped correction. Not the least of my debts to the printers is their unfailing patience. The press copy was sent to them towards the end of March, 1937, and the text and appendices were printed by August, 1939, when I was engaged in organising an Oriental Research Institute at Tirupati. The preoccupations incidental to the engagement made it, along with intervals of bad health, impossible for me to resume the work and complete it by writing an Introduction till recently. An interval of two years like this would have exhausted the considerateness of any other printers.

No work on Dharmaśāstra can afford to forget its debt to the labours of the pioneers who cleared the jungle and paved the way. In the group, three names, viz. those of G. Bühler, J. Jolly and Mr. P. V. Kane, stand out. All subsequent investigators have to walk on the paths they traced, and to build on the foundations which they laid. In the Introduction prefixed to this reconstruction, several of their conclusions are dissented from and their arguments traversed. Finality cannot yet attach to statements on the dates, inter-relations and sequential position of our smṛtis. Indian chronology is like a series of bricks placed in a line, all of which topple down if one brick is displaced. Much work will have yet to be done, in the way of providing apparatus for study in a clearing house of quotations from Dharmaśāstra, and re-examination of results to test them for soundness and strength. Where I have been obliged to differ from 'established' views, I have done so in a spirit of humility and with a sense of responsibility springing from the study of the contributions to the baffling problems that must confront any one who essays to rebuild a lost code.

INTRODUCTION

1. Among writers on Dharmaśāstra one of the most frequently quoted is Bṛhaspati. His smṛti is largely cited in discussions of law and procedure (vyavahāra). He shares the distinction with Nārada and Kātyāyana. Thus, in the famous South Indian digest (nibandha) —the Vyavahāranirṇaya of Varadarāja—the number of ślokas taken from Bṛhaspati, Kātyāyana and Nārada are 380, 348 and 336 respectively. In the more voluminous Smṛticandrikā of Devaṇṇa Bhaṭṭa, which also belongs to the first quarter of the thirteenth century A.D., the corresponding numbers are 580, 600 and 630. In Aparārka's commentary on the vyavahāra section of Yājñavalkyasmṛti, the number of ślokas quoted from each of these writers is 281, 251 and 389 respectively. In Vijñāneśvara's Mitākṣarā, which, consistently with the claim implicit in its title as well as its declaration, aims at brevity, the number of citations from these three smṛtis is small both absolutely and relatively, being only 16 ślokas from Bṛhaspati in the vyavahāra section as against 155 from Nārada and 63 from Kātyāyana. Thus, except in the Mitākṣarā, the three writers run one another close in the race for popularity. Quotations from the three smṛtis occur also in the āhnika (daily rites) and prāyasccitta (expiation) sections of the digests and commentaries; but, their number is relatively small when considered with the citations on vyavahāra from the same writers.

2. It will not, however, be wise to draw any inference as to the extent and relative authoritativeness of these smṛtis from these figures. The choice of authorities, where, according to a postulate of Dharmaśāstra, all smṛtis (with the exception of Manusmṛti, to which a pre-eminent position is assigned in a famous verse of Bṛhaspati)[1] are equally authoritative, is often the result of accident. Digests and commentaries generally copied quotations from older writers of the same class. If, in support of an opinion, an early commentator or nibandhakāra (digest-maker) happened to quote a smṛti, though identical views were available in several other smṛtis, his choice will automatically restrict the selection of authorities by later commentators who based their works on that of the earlier writer. This is why gaps appear when a lost smṛti like that of Bṛhaspati or Kātyāyana is reconstructed on the basis of quotations; for, the rebuilt work looks lop-sided. The defect will be more prominent but for the circumstance that even the early nibandhakāras and commentators had several older commentators to draw from, not all of whom had the same predilections to particular smṛtis in the selection of authorities to support their conclusions.

3. This habit or practice makes it obligatory for one who essays the reconstruction of a lost smṛti to draw upon as wide a circle of secondary sources as possible, in which quotations from it are to be found, in order that such gaps may be filled up. Of the three smṛtis referred to, two have been lost, viz. those of Bṛhaspati and Kātyāyana, and it is doubtful if they will ever be recovered. There is nothing to justify the belief of Bühler, to which Jolly refers (Hindu Law and Custom, p. 56) that they were available till recently. When ślokas from either of these writers are found in recent works like the Bālambhaṭṭīya (c. 1750 A.D.), which cannot be traced in older works, it will not be safe to presume that they had access to the original smṛtis from which they quote; as it is very probable that they took their quotations from older digests not now available. Copies of the smṛtis of such authority will have been available in such a case, and they would have survived to our day. Mr. P. V. Kane's reconstruction of the vyavahāra section of the lost smṛti of Kātyāyana (1933) was based on twenty-two commentaries and digests, including two still unpublished.[1] He was able, even from so small a body of sources, to collect 973 ślokas ascribed to Kātyāyana. As many as 121 additional ślokas of Kātyāyana are to be found in a single digest—Varadarāja's Vyavahāranirṇaya, which was not available to Mr. Kane.[2]

4. Kātyāyana's contribution to law and procedure thus consists, as now known, of at least 1,094 ślokas, which exceeds the total number of ślokas in Yājñavalkyasmṛti (1,010 verses, out of which only 60 relate to the duties of the king, and 307 to vyavahāra) and the longer text of Nāradasmṛti (1,028 verses) published in 1886 by J. Jolly.[3] The recension of Nāradasmṛti published in 1929 at Trivandrum with the title Nāradīya-Manusamhitā (with the ancient commentary of Bhavasvāmin, c. 8th century A.D.)[4] is slightly longer than Jolly's version. As quotations from Kātyāyana dealing with āhnika and prāyasccitta occur in the digests and bhāṣyas, an exhaustive survey of the available dharmaśāstra works might reveal the existence of other fragments of this lost smṛti, which in the aggregate will prove to be not smaller than its recovered vyavahāra content. Even the latter might swell up, as Mr. Kane surmised, to about 1,500 ślokas on a fuller survey of available sources than he attempted.

5. In 1889 Dr. Jolly published in the Sacred Books of the East an English rendering of 697 ślokas on vyavahāra attributed to Bṛhaspati, and he arranged the verses in the order followed by Nāradasmṛti. He based his reconstruction on fifteen secondary works, out of which five were dealt with from English versions.[1] The originals of these recovered verses were not published by Dr. Jolly. But even the number collected and translated by him proved so important that judicial use of them was made by the courts. Jolly acclaimed these fragments 'as among the most precious relics of the early legal literature of India'. Not only did he lay stress on the intrinsic value of the recovered fragments 'as containing a full exposition of the whole range of the Hindu law' but he pointed out the value of the code of Bṛhaspati in the determination of the date of Manusmṛti, 'the most authoritative code of ancient India'.

6. In the reconstruction of Bṛhaspatismṛti essayed in this volume, nearly two hundred works have been laid under contribution, including many unprinted works, still in manuscript. The number of ślokas (including under the term a few passages in prose) dealing with vyavahāra is 1,372, nearly double the number collected by Dr. Jolly. Allowing for some repetitions, necessitated by the need to conform to the context in which some ślokas occur in the digests, the aggregate number of ślokas in the 'rebuilt' smṛti is roughly 2,400. The extant Manusmṛti has 2,684 verses, and the seventh, eighth and ninth books of the smṛti, which deal with the duties of the king and the eighteen titles of law, contain 982 ślokas. Many gaps will be revealed in the reconstructed Bṛhaspatismṛti, which could not have existed in its original form. Further consideration may necessitate the excision from the rebuilt smṛti of some verses, dealing chiefly with the determination of suitable moments for the performance of ceremonies, which, in their present form, appear to be additions to an original core. Even after such deductions are made, it is not improbable that the original smṛti will be found to have been longer than the extant version of Manu's code, on which, as suggested by Bühler, it seems to have been composed as a vārttika.

7. It is commonly held that Nāradasmṛti had no non-vyavahāra content, that the existing three recensions of the smṛti, which deal almost exclusively with law and procedure, represent its original form. But, there are quotations on śrāddha (16 ślokas) and āhnika (69 ślokas) from Nārada in Smṛticandrikā,[1] and MM. Vāman Sāstri Islāmpūrkar, who identified most of the quotations from Nārada in the Parāśara-Mādhavīya as from either the printed Nāradasmṛti (ed. Jolly) or the Nāradīyaśikṣā, was unable to locate four verses, cited as from a smṛti by Nārada,[2] which declared certain days as unfit for study (anadhyāya), which forbade fasting by householders with children on certain occasions like samkrānti, eclipses and ekādaśī in dark fortnight, which allowed a brahmacārin to proceed to sanyāsa direct, without becoming a gṛhastha, and which condemned a person who did not feed sanyāsins. Mr. Kane has drawn attention to the fact that Hemādri quotes verses of Nārada on ekādaśī and an astrological yoga named padmaka. The verses in Smṛticandrikā on Viṣṇu worship, to which Mr. Kane has drawn attention,[3] are probably from a purāṇa not a smṛti. The circumstance that Asahāya apparently commented only on the smṛti as it now exists, and that the Nāradīya-Manusamhitā, on which Bhavasvāmin wrote a bhāṣya, generally agrees with the extant version of the smṛti, may go to show that when they wrote there was no recension of Nāradasmṛti with non-vyavahāra content. This would be a stronger argument against the existence of a more comprehensive work than the present in the days of Medhātithi and Viśvarūpa than their omission to cite non-vyavahāra passages from Nārada, on which Mr. Kane would rely (p. 200).[4] On the other hand, besides the currency of verses on non-vyavahāra ascribed to Nārada which has to be explained, there is the well-established tradition to which no prominent smṛti, particularly one claiming to comprehensive (samhitā), failed to conform.

8. The sūtra form of composition lays stress on oral exposition for a proper comprehension of a sūtra book, which was intended to be memorised, as a guide, and not meant to be read. The early smṛtis were in this form. Some of the tradition must have stuck to the verse smṛtis also, and furnished the justification for elaborate commentaries on such smṛtis. The absence of a clear demarcation between religious and secular law in ancient India is reflected in the vagueness of the distinction between crime and wrong. In every offence there is not only the liability to pay compensation to an injured person but there is the obligation to perform expiatory ceremonies. Offences against the spirit of religion or the social order take the place, in gravity, of crimes against the State in modern times. This is why abduction of women and adultery, which lead to varṇa-samkara (confusion of varṇas), were treated as capital offences and classed with theft, for which the old penalty had been death. It was a sign of 'modernism' in Kauṭilya to have imposed only imprisonment and fine as punishments for adultery (p. 228).[1]

9. These two features made for attempts at comprehensive treatment of the rules of Dharma relating to the whole life in works on Dharmaśāstra. The smṛtis of Manu and Yājñavalkya are typical and illustrate the working of the principle. The occurrence of citations dealing with non-vyavahāra matters from smṛtis ascribed to Bṛhaspati, Nārada and Kātyāyana should have appeared natural to those brought up in the tradition. The tacking of a whole book on vyavahāra to a half-verse of Parāśarasmṛti by Mādhavācārya in his commentary on that smṛti would not have struck one who understood the principle as the tour de force it appears to us. It is noteworthy that the great digests also aimed at this completeness, and works, which seem to be independent treatises on topics of Dharmaśāstra, are, as in the case of the Vyavahāranirṇaya and Jīmūtavāhana's three apparently separate works,[2] only parts of a comprehensive nibandha which was perhaps not completed. An appreciation of this point of view is necessary to prevent the rejection of non-vyavahāra material as accretions to the smṛtis, which were composed by Bṛhaspati, Nārada and others. No commentator who cited these writers felt the presence of the distinction between the 'genuine' legal core and the 'added' ritual content of such smṛtis that we now feel, by missing the point of view. It is not quite easy to reconcile the rejection of non-vyavahāra citations bearing the names of Nārada, Bṛhaspati and others as unauthentic with the hypothesis, for which there is justification, of their having deliberately modelled their works on those of Manu and Yājñavalkya, which are comprehensive samhitās.

10. The Indian king was the custodian of social order, and he was expected to see that every one in the kingdom kept to the track laid down for him (nemi-vṛtti in Kālidāsa's famous comparison) by the śāstras.[1] He had therefore to be well-posted in the knowledge of every one's duty, besides knowing his own, both as a Kṣatriya and a king. Rājadharma thus comprehended a conspectus of all Dharma, and was not a mere recital of rules of wise administration (nīti). It might be possible for one who is dedicated for study to acquire all this knowledge from his preceptors, to whom it had come down by oral transmission through generations of teachers. But busy men require to be instructed in their duty in a simpler and more convenient way. A first attempt in the direction of meeting this need will be to expand a dharmasūtra and make it comprehensive. We have an instance of the change in Viṣṇusmṛti, and its merits will be evident if it is compared with a dharmasūtra of the old type like that of Vaśiṣṭha. But even such a sūtra book will remain cryptic unless expounded. Verse served the function of memorising even better than the aphorism (sūtra). The versified smṛti replaced the dharmasūtra in popular use. It gained added attraction by breaking its ties to one school (caraṇa) and aiming at a wide outlook and thoroughness of treatment, Manusmṛti, for example, fulfilled a felt need by its fulness, range. lucidity and association with the most sanctified name in the history of man. It was so also with Yājñavalkyasmṛti. They provided comprehensive, convenient and authoritative presentations of law and usage, in regard to all activities of life, of both men and women, and of every varṇa and āśrama. They incorporated in their texts much actual usage regarding marriage, inheritance and the ordinary business of life. Their range and literary merit, coupled with the sanctity of the great names they bore as their inspirers, won for them not only pre-eminence over other smṛtis of their own time, but a lasting influence. This is why generations after generations of lawyers and canonists continued to centre round their works their own conceptions of law and usage, and to express them in commentaries. The versified codes were books which could be read at leisure.[2] They were accessible even to those to whom the old type of oral instruction in dharma in gurukulas would not have been open. With their widespread study grew their influence, which was felt in the modulation of the life of the people so as to bring it into line with the ideals of life and the hereafter which they held out.

11. It was to this new type of smṛti rather than to the sūtra form that redactions of the teachings of old schools or teachers, like Bṛhaspati or Vyāsa, would tend to conform. They would be in verse like their models. To displace Manu and Yājñavalkya from the position they had attained after their smṛtis attained their present form was not possible. But, popularity and influence will come if a new smṛti, embodying the core of more ancient and individual doctrine, recognised their pre-eminence and couched its views as interpretations or amplifications of the classics of dharma. A realistic treatment of law, which would bring it into line with the changing needs of society, would be possible to a new smṛti (a new recension of an old smṛti) if its views, in relation to those of Manusmṛti for example, were expressed as interpretations of a follower or a scholiast rather than as the dissent of a critic.

12. An attitude of deference, even when expressing dissatisfaction with the views of the classic, would save the new smṛti from any suspicion of rivalry and its adverse effects on its own authority. This is to be seen in Bṛhaspati's relations to Manusmṛti, which he admittedly knew in its present form, as he cites an opinion found in Manusmṛti (VIII, 4) as Bhṛgu's. He states categorically: 'The pre-eminence of Manu (among smārtas) is recognised by lawyers (smṛtam), because he has summarised the meaning of the Vedas. (Hence) the smṛti which goes against the teaching of Manu (Manvartha-viparītā) is not held in esteem'.[1] And, when it came to his differing from Manu, as in the doctrine of indivisibility of certain forms of property like clothes, he words his dissent deferentially, suggests that his point was not considered (na vicāritam), and refrains from mentioning the honoured name of the sage criticised.[2] When he has to refer to a view opposed to that of Manu, Bṛhaspati surmises the grounds of Manu's opinion, even though Manu had not expressed them, and then proceeds to state the grounds of the other view. Thus, Manu (IX, 224) enjoined the king to flog gamblers without stating why they should be punished. Kauṭilya and Yājñavalkya allow gambling under Government supervision. Bṛhaspati states the case thus: 'Manu prohibited gambling because it destroys truth, purity and wealth. It is permitted by others when it is associated with the payment of a share to the king. For the purpose of its help in discovering thieves, it should be conducted under Government superintendents'.[1] The police-value of controlled gambling is stated by both Kauṭilya and Yājñavalkya (II, 203), but the fiscal reason is stated explicitly only by Kauṭilya (p. 198).[2] The allusion in 'by others' (anyaiḥ) is more probably to Kauṭilya than to Yājñavalkya; or, it may even be a reference to Āpastamba's sanction of State-supervised gambling (II, 25, 12-13).[3] The influence of a common milieu is a more probable cause of identity of views between the newer and the older smṛtis than deliberate copying.

13. It is noteworthy that the new codes bear names celebrated in Indian legend. Manu is the mind-born son of the Creator. Yājñavalkya's name is illustrious in the list of Vedic ṛṣis. He compiled the Śukla-Yajur-Veda, and there are references in the Śatapatha-brāhmaṇa to his colloquies with the wise king Janaka. In the Upaniṣads he is the philosopher par excellence. His old fame as a yogin finds re-affirmation in the smṛti to which his name is given (III, 110)[4] in the statement that he composed a yoga-śāstra. In citations of his legal views by later writers he is frequently referred to as the Yogī. Nāradasmṛti claims to be a part of the abridgement of a huge work on Dharma, which Bhagavān Manu had, in his compassion, composed, 'in order to promote the welfare of all beings', in a hundred thousand ślokas and 1,080 chapters. 'Manu's original composition is read by the gods and Gandharvas.' Nārada, to whom Manu had delivered the work, finding that 'it could not be easily remembered by mortals' abridged it in 12,000 ślokas. This was still further reduced by the sage Mārkaṇḍeya to 8,000, and by the Bhārgava Sumati to 4,000 ślokas. The extant Nāradasmṛti, which runs to a thousand ślokas, claims to be only the ninth chapter of the abridgement in 12,000 ślokas, which dealt with vyavahāra.[1] Manusmṛti professes to be a record of the recitation of Manu's teachings by his disciple, the sage Bhṛgu (I, 59-60; V, 1–3; and XII, 2 and 126). The chapters of the extant Manusmṛti end with the words 'iti Mānave dharmaśāstre Bhṛgu-prokte . . . adhyāyaḥ'. Dr. K. P. Jayaswal combined the two stories and contended that the current Manusmṛti is the composition of a historical author named Sumati.[2] If Bhṛgu the reciter of Manusmṛti and Sumati are regarded as identical, and the tradition contained in the preface to Nāradasmṛti is accepted, the latter would be a fragment of the earlier and larger version of the dharmaśāstra of Manu than the smṛti which now passes as his.

14. The exordium appears to have been a part of the text of Nāradasmṛti on which Asahāya commented, but it is missing in the recension for which Bhavasvāmin wrote a bhāṣya. The legend cannot therefore be regarded as undisputed. But on one point both these early commentators are agreed. They regard the author as the famous ṛṣi Nārada, and treat the smṛti as an inspired work, deriving authority from a semi-divine source. Commentators like Viśvarūpa (c. A.D. 800) and Medhātithi (c. A.D. 850) shared the belief in the inspired character of these smṛtis. The critical acumen displayed in their bhāṣyas renders it unlikely that they would have accepted the inspired origin of any smṛti, whose composition was not beyond their computation. Centuries must intervene between the assertion of inspired authorship and its spontaneous acceptance by such critical commentators. In ages of faith, the claim of even a newly discovered work to be the composition of a famous ṛṣi will prove a powerful influence in securing the reception of its views and the acceptance of its authoritativeness.

15. These considerations apply to Bṛhaspatismṛti. To ascribe to Bṛhaspati any work or doctrine would have been to endow it with potential influence and authority. The name was famous in the Vedas. 'Bṛhaspati, or Brāhmaṇaspati, is the name of a deity in the Rig Veda, in whom the action of the worshipper upon the gods is personified. He is the suppliant, the sacrificer, the priest, who intercedes with the gods, on behalf of men, and protects them against the wicked. He is the prototype of priests and is the purohita of the divine community.'[1] In Roth's words, he was the impersonation of the spirit of devotion, the lord of prayer, whose energetic action compelled the beneficence of the gods. The later conception of his unsurpassed wisdom, making it a high compliment to be compared to him in intelligence (buddhi), is reflected in the phrase 'Bṛhaspatīva buddhyā' which occurs in a Brāhmaṇa. In the Rāmāyaṇa, the simile occurs thrice, once each to magnify the intelligence of Rāma, Lakṣmaṇa and Angada. Bṛhaspati is a son of Angiras (R.V., II, 23, v. 18). A hymn refers to his persuasive tongue (mandra jihvam, R.V., IV, 50, 1). He is the guide, patron and protector of the pious, whom he saves from calamities (R.V., II, 23, 4ff.). In the Mahābhārata he is represented as the eldest son of Angiras, the brother of Samvarta-the rival of Śukra or Uśanas the preceptor of the Daityas, the hereditary preceptor of the devas and the purohita of Indra, and the father of Bharadvāja. He is a pupil of Manu, who instructs him in the causation of the universe (XII, 201–204). There is probably a Vedic authority for the relationship between Manu and Bṛhaspati, if we follow the interpretation of Śāyana of R.V., I, 105, 5: 'Bṛhaspati! Do us always good; we desire that blessing and protection which was placed in thee by Manu' (Bṛhaspate sadam innaḥ sugam kṛdhi—śam yor yatte Manurhitam tadīmahe).

16. The Epic distinguishes between the theological and legal teachings of Bṛhaspati. His teaching advocating activity and self-reliance and condemning fatalism and despondency is repeated by Draupadi to Yudhiṣṭhira (II, 32) and it passes as his nīti. He instructs Yudhiṣṭhira in karmavipāka, the theory of the incarnation of persons who had committed wrong actions as animals (XIII, 173). His exposition of the functions of kings to Vasumanasa, king of Kośala, is reproduced as an 'old story' (itihāsam purātanam) in a whole chapter of Śāntiparva (67). It stresses the necessity of government for security of person and property (mamatvam na ca vindeyur yadi rājā na pālayet, v. 19), the economic foundation (vārtamūla) of society, the enormity of the offence of public peculation, and the indissoluble union as of body and spirit between king and subject (Rājā prajānām prathamam śarīram, prajāśca rājno 'pratimam śarīram). He is credited with having condensed the secret of fame, when questioned by Indra, as consisting in equanimity (sāntvam), pleasant manner, liberality, suavity in speech and rigour in just punishment (XII, 84, 3–10). The Matsyapurāṇa (ch. 47) relates a story of Bṛhaspati having stolen victory for the gods in their contest with the asuras by taking the form of their preceptor Śukra, then on a long honey-moon, and deluding them with false doctrines. It is possible to see in the legend either the source or an explanation of the atheistical views cited in the Sarvadarśanasamgraha as Bṛhaspati's.[1] Uncanny wisdom and a gift for seeing things as they are would appear to be the qualities which emerge as the distinguishing marks of the sage in the legends circling round his name. The part of worldly wisdom (naya) in upholding the social order is implied in the panegyrics of the teachings of Bṛhaspati and Uśanas in the Epic (III, 150, 29).[2]

17. From the standpoint of literary tradition the legends centering round Bṛhaspati which are of most interest are those which ascribe to him the composition of cardinal works on Arthaśāstra and Dharmaśāstra. In the fifty-ninth chapter of the Śāntiparva an account is given of the composition by the Creator (Brahmā) who wished to instruct the world in the means of avoiding anarchy and unhappiness of a colossal treatise in 100,000 chapters in which he dealt with Dharma, Artha and Kāma (v. 29), some of whose contents are indicated (vv. 30–73). Śiva first mastered the treatise. He reduced its size to 10,000 chapters, and his abridgement was known as Vaiśālākṣam. Indra reduced it still further to half the size of Śiva's version. To this the name Bāhudantaka was given. This was abridged in 3,000 chapters by Bṛhaspati, and Śukra reduced it still further to a book of 1,000 chapters (vv. 81–86). In the same work (ch. 58) it is stated that Bṛhaspati, Uśanas, Indra, Manu Prācetasa, Bharadvāja and Gauraśiras had all composed books on Rājanīti (vv. 1–3). The Kāmasūtra of Vātsyāyana mixes up the two traditions of the Mahābhārata. It states that Brahmā composed a comprehensive work on trivarga in 100,000 chapters, from which Manu Svāyambhuva extracted the portion relating to Dharma, and Bṛhaspati that dealing with Artha.[3] The legends retailed by the Nāradasmṛti substitute Manu Svāyambhuva for Brahmā (Svayambhū), reduce chapters to ślokas, and in place of Śiva, Indra and Bṛhaspati as the summarisers of the original code, Nārada, Mārkaṇḍeya and Sumati Bhārgava are substituted.[1] A verse from the Skandapurāṇa cited by Mr. Māndlik refers to four authoritative summaries of the huge work of Svāyambhuva Manu by Bhṛgu, Nārada, Bṛhaspati and Angiras.[2] The common elements in the legends are two: recognition of the composition of works on Arthaśāstra as well as Dharmaśāstra by Bṛhaspati and its being a compendium of the work of Manu, or Svāyambhuva.

18. Other literary traditions confirm the existence of independent works by Bṛhaspati on Arthaśāstra and Dharmaśāstra. Kauṭilya's Arthaśāstra begins with an invocation of Śukra and Bṛhaspati (Namaś-Śukra-Bṛhaspatibhyām). There are seven citations of the views of the 'school of Bṛhaspati' (Bārhaspatyāḥ). The form of reference suggests that a body of doctrine had grown up on an original work of Bṛhaspati, which had a unity and distinguishing features that marked it off from the tenets of other schools of Arthaśāstra. A position of recognised influence must be inferred for the views of Bṛhaspati, if they had been found worthy of such differentiation. The first allusion is to Bṛhaspati's position that Vārtā and Daṇḍanīti were the only two branches of knowledge of importance to the student of Arthaśāstra (p. 6). The description is confirmed by the account of Bṛhaspati's allocution on the qualifications of kings (Rājaguṇa) given by Bhīṣma in the Śāntiparva, in which the following passages occur: (1) Daṇḍa-nītim samāśritya śaśamsāsmai Bṛhaspatiḥ (v. 7). (2) Vārtāmulo hyayam lokas-tayā vai dhāryate sadā (v. 35). The next citation (p. 29) is of the view that the number of ministers in the cabinet should be sixteen. The Mahābhārata (XII, 85, 11) indicates a smaller cabinet than that suggested by any of the writers quoted by Kauṭilya: 'Aṣṭānām mantriṇām madhye mantram rājopadhārayet'. In the punishment of officials whose negligence or dishonesty causes loss to the fisc, Bṛhaspati is said to have held the justifiability of a fine of ten times the loss, being only less severe than Uśanas (p. 63). For childishly giving false testimony the penalty imposed by Bṛhaspati is said to have been flogging (citro ghātaḥ, p. 177). The penalty imposed by Manusmṛti (VIII, 122) for the offence is only a fine of 100 paṇas. As a minor is not competent to be a witness, bālabhāva, which is here punishable is that of a grown-up person, as explained by Medhātithi.[1] The great severity of Bṛhaspati as cited in the Kauṭilīya is inexplicable except on the ground of frivolousness in a false witness being construed as meriting exemplary punishment. No corresponding dictum has been found to this rule in the recovered fragments of Bṛhaspatismṛti. Similarly no confirmation is available in the smṛti fragments for the dictum of Bṛhaspati quoted by Kauṭilya, which makes one who engages another to commit forcible appropriation to pay in addition to the prescribed fine the amount promised to the person who actually commits the offence (p. 192). The last citation is about a tactical disposition of forces described by Bṛhaspati. Caṇḍeśvara's Rājanītiratnākara (p. 79) ascribes to Bṛhaspati (Bārhaspatya) the view that only the eldest son should be selected, even if a younger son is of good conduct (guṇavatsu kaniṣṭheṣu) for succession to a kingdom, prior marriage, and the performance of sapiṇḍīkaraṇam for a dead father.[2] The right to these goes by seniority, not merit. The Pancatantra (II, 41) makes suspicion the characteristic doctrine of Bṛhaspati, a view which is in accord with that enunciated by Bhīṣma in the Mahābhārata (XII, 85, 33-34). Refusal to confide in any one, even a son, is declared by Bhīṣma to be the secret of successful kingship, enunciated in the śāstra. In Bhāsa's Pratimānāṭakam, in Rāvaṇa's vaunt of his learning, Bṛhaspati's work is treated as the Arthaśāstra par excellence.

19. The Arthasūtra of Bṛhaspati is lost beyond recovery. A short work bearing the title of Bārhaspatyasūtram exists in South Indian recensions, and it is now available with an English translation, in two editions.[1] It has six chapters and 430 prose aphorisms. In form it is analogous to the Cāṇakyasūtra of which numerous manuscripts exist, and which has been often printed. Its declaration that Daṇḍanīti is the only science (vidyā) is opposed to the authentic view of Bṛhaspati that both Vārtā and Daṇḍanīti are the relevant vidyās. It mentions the shrine of Jagannātha Puri (Puruṣottama) and many South Indian geographical names. The word Hūṇa occurs in it (III, 103). It is undistinguished in matter and is a shallow collection of platitudes. Not improbably it is a modern imitation of the Cāṇakyasūtra compiled in South India and fathered upon the eponymous Arthaśāstrakāra. The forgery is a tribute to the persistence of Bṛhaspati's fame as a writer on statecraft.

20. Viśvarūpa's commentary on Yājñavalkyasmṛti (the Bālakrīḍā) has a long passage from Bṛhaspati on the qualifications to be possessed by the several ministers of State, over and above those specified by Yājñavalkya (I, 307-308). The functionaries described in the quotation are the commander-in-chief (senāpati), chamberlain (pratihārī), the master of the horse (aśvādhyakṣa), the keeper of elephants (hastyadhyakṣa), the envoy (dūta), the chief minister (mantrī) and the uparika (president of the council of ministers ?). The description, like the verse of Yājñavalkya to which it relates, is taken by Viśvarūpa (I, p. 183) as related to the 'chief ministers' (pradhāna-mantryartham caitad vacanam). In indicating the qualities needed in the mantrin, Bṛhaspati lays down (in the passage cited) that the officer should, inter alia, be a master of the works of Manu, Bṛhaspati and Uśanas and expert in

Daṇḍanīti. The general is, on the other hand, required to possess proficiency in Arthaśāstra (arthaśāstra-kṛta-yogyaḥ). In explaining Yājñavalkya's injunction to the king to rise well-protected (kṛtarakṣaḥ) and look into his daily affairs (I, 323) Viśvarūpa cites the commencement of a passage of Bṛhaspati enjoining the king to wake up with the auspicious sounds of temple conches (brahma-śaṅkha), daily purification ceremony (puṇyāha) and the songs of court panegyrists, then perform his morning prayers, worship gods, ancestors, and Brāhmaṇas at least mentally, get his arms from a servant whose loyalty and purity are proved by his devotion to trivarga, and surrounded by functionaries of proved fidelity, proceed to the business of the day, and leaves the quotation unfinished with the words ityādi. The implication is that the passage of Bṛhaspati was well known and could be presumed to be accessible to a contemporary reader of Viśvarūpa, and that Bṛhaspati's work from which the passage was cited was still current, i.e. about A.D. 800.

21. Viśvarūpa summarises the advice of writers on Nīti in a long passage as a commentary on Yājñavalkya's injunction that the king should daily meet his spies and secret service men (I, 324). This précis (nīti-saṃkṣepaḥ) covers partially the detailed precepts in the Kauṭilīya (I, 10 and 16, pp. 18–32), but contains matter which is not found in that work. From the express recommendation of Bṛhaspati and Uśanas by Bṛhaspati himself, and Viśvarūpa's dependence on Bṛhaspati, it may be presumed that the summary contains Bṛhaspati's views on the subject. Kauṭilya's treatment of the subject covers over fourteen pages of print. It is not unlikely, judging from the copiousness of the extracts from his work on the qualifications of ministers and the daily routine of the king, that Bṛhaspati's treatment of espionage was not less extensive. It may be remembered that the traditional feature of Bṛhaspati's statecraft was the advocacy of suspicion. In explaining Yājñavalkya's rule (II, 38) [1] that the king should restore to the owner any property that had been stolen (and not recovered, as otherwise the guilt of theft will lie on the king), Viśvarūpa (II, p. 115) quotes three sūtras of Bṛhaspati laying down the same rule in even clearer terms, and the addition of the words 'ityādi' at the end of the quotation would suggest that the passage of Bṛhaspati which dealt with the topic was longer.

22. Are these quotations from the lost Arthasūtra of Bṛhaspati? They occur in comments on verses of a smṛti which dealt with the functions of the king and with sāmānya-nyyāya (ordinary law). If the topics are germane to a smṛti like that of Yājñavalkya, there is no reason to treat the above citations from Bṛhaspati as necessarily foreign to a dharmaśāstra by him. A comparison of the Kauṭilīya and Śukranīti with the codes of Manu and Yājñavalkya will reveal the overlapping of a smṛti and an arthaśāstra. The whole of the seventh book of Manusmṛti is devoted to the treatment of polity. There are 'political' injunctions in other parts of the work. The king's duty to decide law suits after hearing them either personally or by deputy is declared at the beginning of the eighth book (vv. 1–10), and some regulative functions of the State are dealt with at the end of that section (vv. 401–403). His personal duties, which are held to include the making of gifts to Brāhmaṇas (IX, vv. 313–323; XI, 21–23), to make conquests (IX, 251; X, vv. 115, 119), to settle taxes and duties (X, 118 and 120), to be just (VIII, 18-19, 126–129, 170–175; IX, 249), to seek death in battle (IX, 323) and to treat as his wards women and minors (VIII, vv. 27-28), are described in other sections of the smṛti. The theory of royal policy is treated in both the seventh (vv. 160–215) book, to which it directly belongs, and the ninth (vv. 294–300). Yājñavalkya devotes about fifty verses in the concluding chapter of the first book of his smṛti (ācārādhyāya) to the duties of the king. On the other hand, the third and fourth books of the Kauṭilīya, entitled dharmasthīya and kaṇṭakaśodhana, are devoted to civil and criminal law. Jurisprudence and Political Science must overlap.

23. The form of these dicta of Bṛhaspati on polity is prose, the vehicle of expression in the older sūtra books. But that his arthaśāstra views were also in verse must be inferred from ślokas cited as his in the Mahābhārata. Thus, in Śāntiparva (XXIII, 14-15): 'This verse (gāthā) was sung by Bṛhaspati: "As a cobra in a hole swallows (mice in the hole), so does the earth swallow up the king who will not fight and the Brāhmaṇa who will not retire from the world"'.[1] That this sentiment was held by others also is shown by its being attributed in slightly different words to Uśanas in a later chapter (LVI, 2-3).[2] Another śloka is said to be taken from the Bārhaspatya-śāstra (ib., LV, 38-39):

'In the science composed by Bṛhaspati of old this śloka is found, O King, which is applicable to the present matter (i.e. evil effects of the king's mildness). Hear it as I recite it: "The king who is daily forgiving is humiliated by even the low-bred person, who ascends his head even as the elephant driver does, and leads him"'.[1] A third view of Bṛhaspati from his Rājyādhikāra (chapter on kings) is cited later (ib., LVI, 6-7): 'This ancient śloka from the Rājyādhikāra of Bṛhaspati has been sung by king Marutta: "The abandonment of the preceptor is enjoined, if he becomes arrogant, follows wrong ways, and is unable to discriminate between what should be done and not done"'.[2] A reading of the last hemistich gives the meaning: 'He is found liable to punishment permanently' (daṇḍo bhavati śāsvataḥ). There are other views of Bṛhaspati cited in śloka form (e.g. ib., CLXIX, 12 on the four ways of accomplishing one's aim,[3] viz. by friends, learning, gold and intelligence) in which it is not clear that we have the very words of the sage.[4] However it be, it is clear that on rājanīti there were anciently current opinions of Bṛhaspati, some of which are expressly stated to be from his book on king-craft, that were in metrical form. If Bṛhaspati did not compose more than a single work on arthaśāstra, it must be presumed, if these ancient sayings are authentic, that the book was partly in prose and partly in verse.

24. Recognition of Bṛhaspati as a smṛti writer is fairly early, taking smṛti in the sense which has now become closely associated with the term as equal to dharmaśāstra (Manu, II, 10).[1] The casual mention of the names of a number of smṛti writers in the dharmasūtras of Āpastamba, Baudhāyana and Vaśiṣṭha indicates the existence of a copious literature of dharmaśāstra even before their days.[2] Kauṭilya's reference to the pre-eminent place of dharmaśāstra (p. 150) suggests the influential position which smṛtis had gained by the fourth century B.C. The earliest list of smṛtis is perhaps that contained in a sūtra of Gautama, quoted by Aparārka.[3] Though this is not to be found in the existing Gautama-Dharmasūtra, its antiquity is unquestionable. One of the sixteen smṛti authors mentioned in it (dharmaśāstra-praṇetāraḥ) is Bṛhaspati. Śankha-Likhita, whose fraginstruction is referred to as embodied in a science (sāstra), e.g. Devarṣir Vāsavagurur Devarājāya dhīmate, yat prāha śāstram bhagavān Bṛhaspatiḥ (Sabhāparva, 50, 8). The Bṛhaspatismṛti, which is usually found in collections of minor smṛtis conforms to this legend by being in the form of an address to Indra by Bṛhaspati :—

Evam Indreṇa pṛṣṭosau deva-devapurohitaḥ
Vācaspatir mahāprājño Bṛhaspatir-uvāca ha. (Ib., 3.)

[1] श्रुतिस्तु वेदो विज्ञेयो धर्मशास्त्रं तु वै स्मृतिः ।
ते सर्वार्थेष्वमीमांस्ये ताभ्यां धर्मो हि निर्बभौ ॥

[2] Āpastamba cites by name the following ten writers on Dharma : Eka, Kaṇva, Kāṇva, Kuṇika, Kutsa, Kautsa, Puṣkarasādi, Varṣyāgani, Śvetaketu and Hārīta. Baudhāyana also cites Hārīta and the following other seven: Aupajanghani, Kātya, Kāsyapa, Gautama, Prajāpati, Manu and Maudgalya. Four of these, viz. Gautama, Yama, Hārīta and Manu are cited by Vasiṣṭha in addition to Yama. Gautama cites only Manu by name, and others anonymously as 'eke', 'ekeṣām' and 'ācāryaḥ'. Thus, at least seventeen smṛti writers anterior to these early sūtrakārāḥ are known by name, as compared with the seventeen Arthaśāstra writers or schools cited by Kauṭilya.

ments are in sūtra form, repeats this list with slight variation.[1] The earliest indisputable list is, however, that in Yājñavalkyasmṛti (I, 4-5) in which among twenty writers of smṛtis Bṛhaspati is included.[2] Paiṭhīnisi increases the number of smṛtis in his list to thirty-six and Guru, i.e. Bṛhaspati, is one of them.[3] Digests of smṛti doctrines like the Caturvimśatimata and the Ṣaṭ-trimśanmata, which Mr. Kane would assign to the period A.D. 700–900, do not fail to mention Bṛhaspati, who is one of the selected writers dealt with by them.[4] The only exception to the general testimony in favour of the authority of Bṛhaspati as a smṛti writer is the list in Parāśarasmṛti as 'heard of' (śrutāḥ) in which his name does not occur.[5] But in view of its being found in the list of the much earlier Yājñavalkya, and the consensus of epic tradition in favour of his being one of the earliest to condense the divinely inspired dharmaśāstra which was itself the source of Manu's work, the omission of Bṛhaspati from Parāśara's list is to be explained by regarding the list as illustrative and not exhaustive. In view of the general tendency today to place Nāradasmṛti before the work of Bṛhaspati,[1] it is noteworthy that Nārada's name does not appear in the lists of Gautama-sūtra, Yājñavalkya, Śankha-Likhita and Parāśara, while a list of Angiras given in Smṛticandrikā includes him among twenty-eight authors of minor smṛtis (upasmṛti).[2] Paiṭhīnisi, who gives a list of thirty-six writers on smṛti and Vṛddha-Yājñavalkya include Nārada's name, while the last omits most of the great names, including Bṛhaspati's. In the eighteen smṛtis in the list of the Garuḍapurāṇa[3] and the twenty in the list of the Agnipurāṇa,[4]

But the first two lines are not to be found in Vīramitrodaya (Paribhāṣā, p. 18), where Nārada with Vasiṣṭha and nineteen others are mentioned after the authors of upa-Smṛtis beginning with Jābāli, as above.

Bṛhaspati's name occurs, but not Nārada's. The tradition that Nārada was the first to condense the huge smṛti composed by the divine Manu, further condensations being made by Mārkaṇḍeya and Sumati Bhārgava, is given in only one place, viz. the preface of the longer version of Nāradasmṛti, which, however, is missing in the recension which Bhavasvāmin commented on. If literary traditions are worthy of credence, the claim of Bṛhaspati to be a very old expounder of Dharmaśāstra and Arthaśāstra is better established than Nārada's as an ancient smṛti writer. In none of the fragments so far recovered does Bṛhaspati mention Nārada or Yājñavalkya. Nor does he mention Viṣṇu or Kātyāyana, so far as discovered. But Manu is named sixteen times, Mānavāḥ once and Vaśiṣṭha once.

25. That a smṛti of Bṛhaspati existed in prose or contained prose passages is evident from a number of prose quotations in Viśvarūpa's bhāṣya. The probability of its being in both prose and verse is suggested by a circumstance. In the long comment on Yājñavalkya, III, 262 (Mitākṣarā, III, 265) prescribing as purification for minor sins (upapātaka) either certain expiations indicated in subsequent ślokas, or cāndrāyaṇa, or fasting for twelve days (parāka), or living on water alone for a month, Viśvarūpa quotes first a verse of Bṛhaspati laying down that he who kills a cow becomes pure after living only on milk and curds for twelve days (infra, Prāyasccitta, v. 52, p. 380), then cites two more verses from the same source (ib., vv. 53-54, p. 380) and adds a prose quotation with the remark 'so also, in that work, another (passage)'—tathaidaṃ tatraivānyat. The passage begins with the words 'dvādaśarātram pancagavyāhāraḥ ('for twelve nights the food should be only pancagavya'). The passage from Bṛhaspati is quoted in full by Viśvarūpa (III, p. 148), while Haradatta in his bhāṣya named Mitākṣarā on Gautama-Dharmasūtra (p. 178) and Vijñāneśvara (p. 418) cite only the words about living on pancagavya for twelve nights. The topic dealt with concerns prāyasccitta. It is therefore clear, firstly, that a smṛti of Bṛhaspati, which included the treatment of prāyasccitta (expiation), was in existence when Viśvarūpa wrote early in the ninth century A.D., and that it was partly in prose and partly in verse.

26. There are five prose quotations on Vyavahāra from Bṛhaspati in Viśvarūpa's bhāṣya. They have been noticed by Mr. Kane (p. 125) and deal with the following: the king's duty to make good property stolen and not recovered (infra, Vyavah., VII, 70, p. 79), graduation of the rate of interest in accordance with the varṇa of the borrower (ib., X, 26, p. 103), the duty of those who inherit a dead man's property to discharge his debts as well as a similar duty on his wife and son (ib., X, 106-7, p. 116), a surety's liability to pay if the principal dies (ib., X, 80, p. 112) and the right of a Śūdra's illegitimate son to get a share of his father's property (ib., XXVI, 83, p. 209).

27. There is a prose passage (infra, p. 112, v. 79) which lays down that certain persons cannot be made sureties: e.g. the king (svāmī) or a master, an enemy, a prisoner (niruddhaḥ), an agent (adhikṛtaḥ), one who has been sentenced to punishment (daṇḍitaḥ), a suspect (saṁśayaḥ), a co-owner (ṛkthī), a friend (mitra), a royal servant (rājavṛtta), one who has become unemotional (vītarāgaḥ), one under a vow (vratī), a pauper, an infant, a very old person, a woman and a diseased person. This is attributed to Bṛhaspati in the Vyavahāramālā,[1] a digest based on Varadarāja's Vyavahāranirṇaya, which was used as a code in Malabar in the middle ages (p. 130, ed. in Malayalam letters, Trivandrum). But, the same passage occurs, with textual variants, in the Vyavahāranirṇaya (p. 248)[2] and is there ascribed to Viṣṇusmṛti, in which the subject of surety ineligibility does not occur at all. There are only four passages in that smṛti on sureties, and its treatment of the subject is scrappy (V, 121 and VI, 41–43); and three of them are in verse. The attribution of this passage to Viṣṇu is thus incorrect. That it is very probably a genuine sūtra in an old text of Bṛhaspatismṛti is suggested by two circumstances: firstly, there is no other passage among the fragments of Bṛhaspati which enumerates those who are disqualified to be sureties, while the treatment of surety (pratibhū) in Bṛhaspati is otherwise full; and secondly, three verses of Kātyāyana (ed. Kane, vv. 114–116),[3] which are based on citations in the Mitākṣarā, Smṛticandrikā, Vivādaratnākara and the Mādhavīya, virtually reproduce this prose passage in śloka form. As Kātyāyana is a follower of Bṛhaspati (whom he quotes and looked upon as a model) it is valid to presume that he paraphrased a sūtra of Bṛhaspati in the above form. The prose passages of Bṛhaspati, so far recovered, do not in any instance cover the same ground as any in verse. For a complete statement of his view both are required. This will tend to show, even apart from Viśvarūpa's explicit statement, cited above, that the recension of Bṛhaspati available in the ninth century was partly in prose and partly in verse, and that it dealt with both vyavahāra and non-vyavahāra matters, as a true dharmasamhitā based on Manu would do. That this form was an intermediate stage in the transition to smṛtis which used verse alone is denoted by the increasing number of verses, as compared with prose, in Viṣṇusmṛti which has nearly 550 verses, as compared, for example, with Vasiṣṭhasmṛti, which though smaller has over 200 verses. In the old sūtra works like those of Āpastamba and Kauṭilya there is a sensible verse-content, but it is relatively small in comparison with the prose.

[1] Mr. Kane (op. cit., p. 530) wrongly ascribes Vyavahāramālā to Varadarāja, and his date for it (eighteenth century) is at least two centuries later than what probabilities indicate.

28. A revision of the form rather than the content is more likely in the case of works which are held to represent the doctrines of ancient schools or ancient writers. To treat such prose passages as implying the existence (and simultaneous availability to digest-writers or bhāṣyakāras like Viśvarūpa) strains probabilities more than to treat such prose as an integral part of a complete smṛti, and as, possibly, a survival of an older sūtra form of the work in which it is found side by side with verse. A smṛti wholly in verse and in the developed śloka form suggests a later stage in evolution than one which is in prose and verse and uses other old metres besides the anuṣṭubh. This is as regards the literary form only. Virtually every smṛti bearing an old name honoured in legend has undergone repeated transformations, in which the form changes more easily than the substance. Ideas which represent an early stage of opinion can be disguised in verse when the sūtras in which they were originally expressed are replaced by ślokas expressing the same idea.[1] The sūtra ascribed to Bṛhaspati on persons ineligible for suretyship when compared to its verse-form in Kātyāyana illustrates the point. But an argument from form alone is not conclusive, as old forms can be revived or deliberately cultivated so as to cast an air of antiquity on a work like Rājaśekhara's Kāvyamīmāmsā.[2] Such artificiality is not indicated by the few prose passages of Bṛhaspati which have come to light along with far more numerous verse statements. Nor can they be treated as paraphrases of verse in prose in view of their being explicitly given as quotations representing the actual words of Bṛhaspati.

[1] This is conspicuous in the śloka redactions of the doctrines of Āpastamba and Gautama, which have come down.

[2] Rājaśekhara (c. A.D. 900) deliberately imitated not only the form and manner of the Kauṭilīya and the Kāmasūtra, 'but also the great authors of Dharmamīmāmsa and Brahmamīmāmsa, and this is evident from the very title of his work, the Kāvya-mīmāmsa' (Intrn. to Kāvyamīmāmsa, ed. Gaekwad's Oriental Series, 1934, p. xvii).

29. There is no difficulty, however, in rejecting as spurious a Bṛhaspatismṛti in verse, which figures in printed and manuscript collections of minor smṛtis, and copies of which are found in almost all big manuscript collections. Its wide dispersion is a tribute to the great name it bears, and has no relation to its contents. It exists in many recensions of varying length. Of four manuscripts of it consulted by Māndlik, two had 80 verses of which all but two were in anuṣṭubh metre, the remaining two being in upajāti and indravajrā, and two had only 49 verses. It was in the form of an address to Indra by his guru, and dealt with gifts. There are several manuscripts of it in the Deccan College Collection and these have 70 or 49 verses. The three recensions, which have been printed (in the collections of minor smṛtis by Jībānanda, Venkateshwar Press and the Ānandāśrama), have all 80 verses. That verses in this work passed as Bṛhaspati's indicated by some of them being cited as merely from Bṛhaspati, though a descriptive note occurs in some of the introductory phrases, e.g. 'Bṛhaspati on gifts' ('Dāne Bṛhaspatiḥ' or 'Dāna Bṛhaspatiḥ'). But the circumstance that only some verses of it are quoted even in digests on gifts like Lakṣmīdhara's Dāna-Kalpataru and Hemādri's Dānakhaṇḍa may indicate the recognition of only parts of it as authentic words of Bṛhaspati. Parts of the work coincide with a recital of Bṛhaspati's colloquy with Indra in the Anuśāsanaparva (XCVIII, śl. 52–100) of the Mahābhārata. It begins with almost the same words as the commoner versions, Iṣṭvā kratuśatena mahatā dakṣiṇāvatā, Maghavā vāgvidām śreṣṭham papracchedam Bṛhaspatim (Mahābhārata), as compared with the common beginning, Iṣṭvā kratuśatam rājā samāptavaradakṣiṇam—Bhagavantam guruśreṣṭham paryapṛcchad Bṛhaspatim. The conclusion is somewhat different, and there are differences in the body of the address. The entire version in 70 ślokas is found in the Padmapurāṇa (Uttarakhaṇḍa, ch. 32, pp. 1309–1312), where it is put into the mouth of the sage Nārada, who had heard the dialogue from Mahādeva. The wholesale absorption of smṛtis by purāṇas is well known.[1] Gifts (dāna) form an important topic of dharmaśāstra. Manu deals with it in several parts of his smṛti over which his views are scattered, e.g. I, 86, 88; III, 95–97, 128–137, 142-143, 149 and 168, 179; IV, 31, 32, 84–91, 226–235, 247–252; VII, 82–86; VIII, 159, 165, 168; IX, 47, 206; X, 75-76,

102–116 ; and XI, 1–6, 24-25, 42 and 70. But, on the other hand, if a sage or interlocutor happens to bear the name of a smṛti author, his words in an epic or purāṇa will often be carelessly quoted as if they were from the smṛti bearing his name. The Bṛhaspatismṛti described above was probably only an extract from the Mahābhārata or the Padmapurāṇa, which was passed on as a smṛti, its source being disguised or forgotten. Certain statements, however, though found in Purāṇas seem to have been regarded as authentic smṛti fragments of Bṛhaspati and were probably so. An instance is the famous imprecatory passage with 'svadattām paradattām vā yo haredvai vasundharām' which occurs in the smṛti attributed to Bṛhaspati as well as in certain purāṇas, e.g. Ādityapurāṇa from which Lakṣmīdhara cites it, or Viṣṇudharmottara to which Hemādri ascribes it. Some of the dicta on gifts in the book may, therefore, be accepted as authentic in a collection of Bṛhaspati fragments.[1]

30. The results of the discussions may now be stated. Bṛhaspati was famous as a writer even before the days of Kauṭilya (fourth century B.C.). The school of Bṛhaspati to which Kauṭilya refers probably dealt with arthaśāstra. But it is doubtful if the differentiation between dharma and artha as necessitating their treatment in separate works, if not schools, had taken place at this period, or even later. Canonical validity attached to both śāstras, and the assumed inferiority of Arthaśāstra in the eyes of smārtas finds no warrant in the traditional attitude. Both claimed a Vedic basis. Both were credited in legend with cardinal works composed by the Creator himself. The concept of trivarga stresses the co-ordination of artha and dharma, and does not regard them as rivals.[2] The hypothesis of divine inspiration in the last resort to both logically precludes any assumption of one conflicting with the other. Infallibility must attach to all inspired writing. It must equally attach to logic (nyāya). Their common aim and trend were recognised by Kauṭilya in a string of statements, whose real drift has been missed by translators and modern interpreters (p. 150) as is that of the famous dicta of Yājñavalkya (II, 21) that the rule to follow is to give precedence in effect to dharma over artha, and the rule of Nāradasmṛti that where a difference is seen between arthaśāstra and dharmaśāstra the latter should prevail (I, 99). Medhātithi and the Mitākṣarā have made it clear that the allusion is not to the views in works on Arthaśāstra as expounded by Uśanas but to the artha content in Dharmaśāstra of which examples have been given.[1]

1 Forty-three verses in land grants, praising the gift of land, soliciting future protection of the grants and denouncing with imprecations those who resume former grants, among which are many ascribed to Bṛhaspati are collected by Mr. Kane with full references to the epigraphic records in which they occur, in an appendix (pp. 1271–1277) to the second volume of his History of Dharmaśāstra (1941). The ascription of some of these verses to both Vyāsa and Bṛhaspati might merely indicate a reference to the colloquy between Indra and Bṛhaspati in the Mahābhārata.

2 Thus, the Kauṭilīya (p. 12):

31. It seems unnecessary to assume that in its early stages the work of Bṛhaspati should have been contained in separate treatises dealing with Arthaśāstra and Dharmaśāstra. Nor is there justification for assuming that for each of these branches of knowledge there existed parallel treatises by Bṛhaspati in prose and verse. In the face of unanimous tradition it seems hypercritical to doubt the common authorship of Bṛhaspati, and there is no warrant for the assumption (Kane, p. 125) that the work of Bṛhaspati to which Yājñavalkya alludes was in sūtra form. The value of the sūtra was its advantage in fixing the points and conclusions of oral exposition in schools. It is not doubted that such exposition preceded the writing of books expressing individual views. The śloka is not an equally convenient medium for this purpose. The mixture of verse and sūtra seems natural to a stage of the evolution of the formal exposition of the views of a school, in which they had attained fulness as the result of discussions. This was probably the form of Bṛhaspati's work in the ninth century A.D. In making his citations from Bṛhaspati, Viśvarūpa, as pointed out by Mr. Kane (p. 210), quotes Bṛhaspati's verse or prose without any attempt at discriminating between them, and shows by his attitude that the jurist and the polity writer Bṛhaspati were one and the same person, an inspired writer far removed from his own age, who dealt with all the topics (vyavahāra and non-vyavahāra) to be found in such works.

32. The fragments of Bṛhaspati, which have come down, might have all been in an old work now lost, but available at least to the early commentators and digests. But before the work assumed that form, it must have passed, like virtually every other smṛti now extant, through several stages of revision. Examination reveals the existence of different strata in even smṛtis like the Mānavadharmaśāstra, whose homogeneity seemed demonstrated by Jolly's critical edition of its text. It was found by Jolly that though the genuine text differed from that which Kullūka popularised in readings, the aggregate number of verses and the numbering of verses was found unchanged throughout. 'The great celebrity of the Code,' he remarks (p. xv), 'appears to have guarded it against sweeping alterations, so that the text remains essentially the same nearly in all commentaries, however widely distant from one another as to the time and locality of their composition.' The integrity of Manu's code from at least the Gupta epoch does not conflict with the above conclusion. Internal inconsistency or contradiction, on which reliance has been placed to infer successive redactions, has been explained as likely to be due to either repetition of conflicting views of earlier smārtas or conformity to the Indian practice of stating opposed views where an option is allowed. We may be on firmer ground if we proceed on the evidence of the subjects dealt with and ideas expressed. On such evidence Bühler held, for instance, the cosmological and philosophical matter in the Manusmṛti (I; II, 89–100; III, 193–201; and XII) to represent the last additions.[1] In smṛtis not enjoying the vogue of Manu's, frequent additions or revisions are more possible, as is indicated by the widely different matter, for instance, of the confused Viṣṇusmṛti.

33. We can recognise in the fragments attributed to Bṛhaspati ideas which are early and ideas which are obviously later. But in the present condition of the dispersed Bṛhaspatismṛti, what is possible is only a collection of all elements which are claimed to have belonged to it, and leave them as they must have been in the work at the epoch to which, judging from its nature, the latest material should belong. The determination of the ages of the different strata which compose the reconstructed Bṛhaspati must await fuller exploration of its content than is possible in a first collection.

34. Though the argument of silence can be used only with great reserve, the occurrence of certain passages of Bṛhaspati in only a single work, and that a comparatively recent work, while it does not appear in earlier works, may at least suggest a need for scrutiny and suspense. Thus a number of verses from Bṛhaspati which deal with the proper

III 'which, beyond doubt, has been added by a later hand' (ib.). 'The twelfth chapter finally is certainly almost entirely due to the author of the metrical version. Its contents are partly foreign to the Dharmasūtras and partly repetitions' (ib., p. lxxiii).

astronomical conjunctions for the performance of various samskāras are cited by Smṛtimuktāphala of Vaidynātha Dīkṣita (sixteenth century), Prayogapārijāta of Nṛsimha (latter half of the fourteenth century) and the Vīramitrodaya of Mitramiśra (c. 1600 A.D.). The indication of the proper time for important ceremonies is a legitimate function of a smṛti, and the rudiments of such indication are found in the gṛhyasūtras.[1] Virtual omission of the treatment in Manu or Yājñavalkya will neither be proof of the unimportance of the specification in a smṛti or its late introduction in smṛti literature. Smārtas exercise individual preferences in omitting or developing topics, which other smārtas do not consider important enough. The worship of Gaṇapati to which Yājñavalkya devotes a section, along with his section on grahaprīti (propitiation of planets) are illustrations to the point.[2] As Bṛhaspati obviously attempts to develop Manu's dicta, to explain them and to supply definitions where Manu omits them, it is not unreasonable to hold that if Bṛhaspati dealt with kālanirṇaya with some fulness, he was doing just what was to be expected, and consequently there is no ground for treating such citations, even if they occur in comparatively late works, as interpolations. But whether they can be regarded as belonging to the early strata of the smṛti or a later will have to be determined by reference to the age to which the knowledge shown may be ascribed. Thus, so early a nibandhakāra as Jīmūtavāhana (c. 1090 A.D.) in his Kālaviveka (held to be his earliest work) describes a conjunction known as Mahājyeṣṭhī, and fixes it as occurring when in the month of Jyeṣṭhā, the Sun is in the constellations

[1] Thus, the auspicious time for upanayana is indicated by Bhāradvāja-gṛhyasūtra (I, 1) as Śuklapakṣa, in an auspicious nakṣatra, which is masculine (आपूर्यमाणपक्षे पुण्ये नक्षत्रे विशेषेण पुंनामधेये), while Āpastamba (I, 1, 1, 19) merely indicates the proper seasons for the three dvijavarṇas. For ancient rules regarding the auspicious seasons, conjunctions of constellations, nakṣatras and months for marriage, see Kane, History of Dharmaśāstra, II (1941), pp. 511–513. For all major samskāras, auspicious times are indicated in the gṛhya und dharma texts.

[2] Yājñavalkyasmṛti (I, 295–308) deals with grahaśānti or propitiation of planets. He concludes: 'The rise and fall of kings depends on the aspects of planets, and the existence and destruction of the world depend upon planets; therefore, planets should be greatly honoured' (I, 308). Gautama (XI, 15-16) advises the king to perform the propitiatory rites recommended by astrologers in times of evil portent. Yājñavalkya treats of the worship of Gaṇeśa or Vināyaka in I, 271–294.

Rohiṇī or Mṛgaśiras in Vṛṣabha-rāśi, and Jupiter and the Moon are in the constellation Jyeṣṭhā, and it happens also to be 'Guru's day' (Thursday), and a full moon. The technical terms used for the constellations are those familiarised by the astronomers from the sixth century A.D. onwards.

35. The mention of a weekday by name and a sign of the zodiac (viz. vṛṣa) furnish other data for fixing the anterior limit of the date of the passage, which, along with some other verses following sequentially, are cited as Bṛhaspati's (pp. 348–350). In one of the ślokas quoted the name of planet Jupiter, of which Bṛhaspati is regent, is Jīva, which is supposed to be derived from Zeus or Jovis. If this hypothesis is correct, the use of the name Jīva must be posterior to the establishment of Hellenic or Roman influence in India, say from the third century A.D. onwards. But, our present knowledge of the history of Indian astronomy and of its affiliations to outside influences is neither full nor decisive. To apply generalisations derived from it will be unwise. H. Jacobi maintained (Z.D.M.G., XXX, pp. 306ff.) that the naming of the weekdays after the planets was established among the Greeks after the second century A.D., and that, accordingly any Indian work which gave the weekdays their planetary names and recited them in the usual order (Sunday, Monday, etc.), could not have been composed before the third century A.D. The late Dewan Bahadur L. D. Swamikannu Pillay (Indian Ephemeris, I, 1922, p. 15) held that the names of the weekdays came into use in India in the Gupta period, that they were not at all in use in India before the fifth century A.D., and their common use begins only in the eighth century A.D. Further, following Burgess (J.R.A.S., 1893) he contended (Ephemeris, p. 18) that the use of the word horā, either as a lagna or a part of the day representing a twenty-fourth division of it, furnishes intrinsic evidence of the work having been composed after the introduction of Ptolemaic astronomy into India, i.e. that it could not have been composed before the sixth century A.D. As such data were used in fixing a date for Yājñavalkyasmṛti (Jolly, Law and Custom, pp. 43f.), who was alleged to show knowledge of Greek astrology, Mr. Kane has, in a lengthy examination of the question (pp. 184-185), maintained that Yājñavalkya 'nowhere mentions the rāśis (zodiacal signs) and probably did not know them'. The nine planets (including in their number, Rāhu and Ketu) are mentioned in their usual order by Baudhāyana (Dh.S., II, 5, 23). Mr. Kane does not find in Yājñavalkya any astrology that was not current in the days of the Brāhmaṇas and the gṛhyasūtras.

36. Against such generalisations 'based on very slender data' (Kane, p. 186) which are used in the determination of the dates of Indian works, certain considerations, which are overlooked in the usual theories of Hellenic influence, may be urged. In an article on 'Indian Weekdays' (Indian Antiquary, XIV, 1885, pp. 1ff.) Sir Alexander Cunningham showed that the naming of the weekdays in the usual order merely followed the naming of the planetary lords of horas, of which the Sūryasiddhānta speaks, along with the lords of the day, and he maintained that the use of the names of weekdays was in common use in India as early as the beginning of the Christian era. A recent writer (Hans Losch) suggests that the knowledge of the planets was derived by India direct from Babylon.[1] Cultural contacts between India and the Hellenic world certainly existed in Aśoka's days, and were probably in existence even before the Macedonian invasion. For a century before and after the commencement of the Christian era, India was the middle-man in a vast trade between China and the Far East on the one hand, and Babylonia, Egypt and the Mediterranean countries on the other. That the trade relations served as a means of spreading Indian culture is now known from the history of Indian cultural influence in the East, in countries which thereby became a 'Greater India'.

37. To deny reciprocal influence and to maintain that all the influence was exerted only from the Hellenic side—a kind of one-way traffic—is to ask for a big draft on belief. Even Greek terms, on the use of which in Indian works intrinsic proof of the post-Hellenic composition of such works is held to be manifest, can conceivably have had an Indian origin. The word 'surunga' or suranga meaning a tunnel, which occurs in the Kauṭilīya four times, is an instance in point.[2] The Greek word syrinx, which conveys the same idea, is said to occur in literature and inscriptions only from the second century B.C. Surunga was held to be derived from syrinx and was coupled with the strange suggestion that the art of tunnelling (to which we have epic testimony) and the word came from Greece. Surunga has an Indian etymology, and the cumulative effect of the evidence being conclusive in favour of the Kauṭilīya, in which it occurs, as older than the second century B.C., the occurrence of syrinx from only that period onwards in Greek may be accounted for by giving it an Indian source.

38. Certain astronomical terms which occur in Indian works and are commonly regarded as borrowed from the Alexandrian astronomers, e.g. horā, dreṣkāṇa (infra, Samskāra, vv. 38–41), kendra (ib., v. 367) and jāmitra (ib., v. 471), occur among the Bṛhaspati ślokas in the present collection. The names look and sound un-Sanskritic. They probably are foreign words, though not necessarily Greek in the last instance. Should they prove to be so, the verses in which they occur should be deemed as brought in at a late revision when such terms had been naturalised in Sanskrit. The presence of such verses will not naturally affect the question of the general antiquity of other citations from Bṛhaspati.

39. The genuineness of some other ślokas, which occur in this reconstruction, may appear doubtful. They occur in the non-vyavahāra sections. A verse (Samskāra, 83, p. 244) is introduced with the words: 'I shall then proceed to describe' (athātaḥ sampravakṣyāmi). The same introduction occurs later (ib., v. 456, p. 293). Certain verses end with a vocative form of address, showing that they were spoken to the person so addressed: Vāsava in śl. 273 on p. 269; śl. 379, p. 283, in which Vajrin is addressed; Pṛthivīpati addressed in Ācāra, śl. 61, p. 318; and śl. 59 in Prāyasccitta, p. 381, addressed to Maitreya. These verses are probably taken from purāṇas in which they are put into the mouth of Bṛhaspati. But, as purāṇas often only translate into their own words current smṛti traditions, even such doubtful quotations cannot be summarily rejected as having no relation to Bṛhaspati's teaching.

40. Other passages whose authenticity might seem dubious occur in the non-vyavahāra sections. Samskāra 399 recommending the patronage of the astrologer is suspect. As in the case of sectarian parts of Viṣṇusmṛti, the verses in the Acārakāṇḍa (p. 310) enjoining one who has become impure to think of Vāsudeva and the waters of the Ganges, which flows from His feet, as entering into him and purifying him, and the propitiation of Viṣṇu, which is recommended on Ekādaśi days (Ācāra, 68, p. 319), may represent such a revision. But, their presence will not be inconsistent with the assignment of a date before the Christian era to Bṛhaspati's work, as the Vāsudeva cult was even then popular, as is evidenced by the famous inscription at Besnagar of the Vaiṣṇava Greek Heliocdorus, who came as an envoy from Antialcidas (second century B.C.) to king Bhāgabhadra Kāśīputra.[1] Such an antiquity is not claimed even for Yājñavalkya-smṛti, which names Bṛhaspati among earlier smārtas.

[1] The worship of Vāsudeva as a god is alluded to by Pāṇini (IV, 3, 98) and Patañjali (II, p. 314) expressly says that Vāsudeva here is not a mere Kṣatriya but the word is the name of God. Kauṭilya enjoins the construction of shrines to Lakṣmī. See R. G. Bhandarkar, Vaiṣṇavism, Śaivism (1913), pp. 3-4. The indication of four holy places as eminently fit for śrāddhas (p. 333), the praise of the sanctity of Gayā (p. 335), Prayāga (p. 373), and the confluence of the rivers Aruṇā and the Sarasvatī (p. 371) are probably authentic views of Bṛhaspatismṛti. Suicide by drowning at Prayāga is a very ancient recommendation, which is held to be an exception to the general interdict against taking away one's life.[1] Indications of six kinds of baths (snāna)[2] (p. 311), the definition of nīla-vṛsa (p. 327), five kinds of śrāddha alleged to have been named by Manu (p. 331) but not traced in Manusmṛti, the naming of the ten Viśvedevas (p. 339), the two kinds of pātaka (p. 376) and the nine kinds of samskāra (p. 376) are in the spirit of Bṛhaspati and deva is mentioned. From the form of the characters in the inscription it appears to have been engraved at least two hundred years B.C.' (op. cit., p. 3). The Besnagar inscription belongs to the earlier part of the second century B.C. 'At that time, Vāsudeva was worshipped as the god of gods, and his worshippers were called Bhāgavatas. The Bhāgavata religion prevailed in the north-western part of India and was adopted even by the Greeks.'

[1] See post, para 175. Ṛg-Veda, Khila., X, 75, 1, describes thus the benefits of suicide at the confluence of the Ganges (sitā, 'white') and the Jumna (asitā, 'black') at Prayāga:

सितासिते सरिते यत्र सङ्गते
तत्राप्लुतासो दिवमुत्पतन्ति ।
ये वै तन्वां विसृजन्ति धीराः
ते जनासोऽमृतत्वं भजन्ते ॥

The commendation of death at Prayāga in Mahābhārata (Vanaparva, LXXXIII, 83, ed. Kumbakonam) is of suicide:

न वेदवचनात्तात न लोकवचनादपि ।
मतिरुत्क्रमणीया ते प्रयागमरणं प्रति ॥

In 1073 A.D. Gāngeya, king of Cedi, committed suicide at the confluence, with his hundred wives (Epigraphia Indica, XII, p. 205 and p. 211):

"प्राप्ते प्रयागवटमूलबन्धौ सार्धं शतेन गृहिणीभिरमुत्र मुक्तिम् ॥"

[2] The six kinds of bath indicated in the verse (p. 311, v. 11) are outside some special baths like kāpila, mantra-snāna and sārasvata described by Bṛhaspati himself. The usual classification is indicated by Śankhasmṛti (VIII, 1–11) into nitya, naimittika, kāmya, kriyānga, abhyangana, and kriyā-snāna. Yama has a special class of vicarious bath for invalids (ed. Jībānanda, p. 565) called ātura-snānam. Aparārka (pp. 134-135) cites Yoga-Yājṇavalkya for seven kinds of baths, which are similar to Bṛhaspati's enumeration.

the relation of his code to Manu's. The praise of kusīda as an āpad-dharma to a Brāhmaṇa (pp. 366-367)[1] is consistent with Bṛhaspati's attitude to such transactions (see infra, Vyavahāra, I, 8, 71; II, 11; VII, 4; IX, 29; X, 6, 68, 102, 122; and XXVI, 147).

42. Certain passages, which appear to have been taken from a purāṇa, and which rest on the authority of the Prayogapārijāta alone for their authenticity, need further confirmation. They refer to Naṭaśāstram, Nāṭya, Vaiṣṇava and Śaiva Āgamas, and Sāmudrikam. Doubts are engendered less by the naming of these works, which belong to classes undoubtedly very ancient, than by their content, and appearance in a single late digest. Physiognomy apparently is an ancient śāstra, judging from its use in the Rāmāyaṇa. But, the name Sāmudrikam is usually explained as due to one Samudra who first treated of it. The animus against dancers, which we find in Kauṭilīya (p. 48) and in the smṛtis, is not against the art but against the vulgar practitioners of it. Though the extant works on the Vaiṣṇava and Śaiva āgamas may be comparatively late works, the cults must be assigned much higher antiquity than the smṛtis in verse, and their tenets may have been laid down in ancient writings, which have not survived in their original form.[2] The form in which they are cited is not in harmony with Bṛhaspati's, as judged by fragments of unimpeachable genuineness.

43. Bṛhaspati's works are not traditionally assigned to any caraṇa or Vedic school. They stand alone. The extant fragments show great partiality to Manusmṛti, and give Manu pre-eminence over all smārtas. Tradition did not also indicate Bṛhaspati as the law-giver of any particular age, as Manu was spoken as the law-giver of the first yuga, Gautama of the second, Śankha-Likhita of the third

[1] Bṛhaspati praises money-lending as an occupation not liable to vicissitudes: 'Sages have named many means of livelihood, but among them money-lending is pre-eminent. Loss comes to cultivation from draught, exactions of the king, the ravages of field-mice, etc., but no such loss accrues to money-lending.' Mr. Kane considers this description satirical, on grounds which are weak (Hist. of Dharmaśāstra, II, 124).

[2] The penetration of Pāncarātra Āgama teaching in South India in very early times is reflected in the hymns of the Vaiṣṇava saints or Āḷwārs. The oldest temples of South India followed the Vaikhānasa-āgama in dedication (pratiṣṭhā) and ritual, which was overtaken by the Pāncarātra ritual. Mr. Kane wrongly treats the two Vaiṣṇava Āgamas as rival schools of South India Vaiṣṇavas (Hist. of Dharma-śāstra, II, p. 917). They are schools of priests, not of worshippers.

and Parāśara of the fourth (Parāśarasmṛti, I, 24).[1] He derives authority in Indian legend from his being represented as one of the summarisers of a divinely created and comprehensive code, embracing the whole trivarga. After the firm establishment of the supremacy of Manu's code, to which Bṛhaspati's express declaration that any smṛti which did not agree with Manu was to be disregarded, what vogue Bṛhaspatismṛti had must have been derived from its affiliation to Manu's code, expressly and by implication. It must have proved a sort of warrant of orthodoxy (a needed counter-weight against any prejudice due to a tradition that Bṛhaspati was a materialist)[2] and on its own intrinsic worth. That these were considerable is shown by the weight attached to his opinion by later writers, who shaped their views on his, like Kātyāyana, and by the numerous citations of Bṛhaspati in commentaries and digests. He was lucid, his treatment of both vyavahāra and non-vyavahāra is more systematic than that of his model, he is fuller than Yājñavalkya, while his comprehension of the scope of a dharma-samhitā is not narrower, and he shows an individuality which makes him voice his disapproval of opinions supported by authority to which he cannot but publicly defer, as well as a sense of realities, such as we should expect from one who claimed to speak with the name of the wisest of the immortals. His dicta are redeemed from the dryness characteristic of smṛtis as a class by flashes of eloquence, poetical imagery and idealism. These qualities must have kept up his influence in competition with the increasing number of versified codes.

44. Bṛhaspati's chronological position has to be determined first by the evidence afforded in his own words of his posteriority to older writers. Secondly, it is determinable, though with less certainty so far as the existing smṛti of Bṛhaspati is concerned, by the celebration of his work in other writings. It has been shown that by the second test, Bṛhaspati must be adjudged a writer of authority on Arthaśāstra and Dharmaśāstra even in the fourth century B.C. But the antiquity of his doctrine cannot be held to attach necessarily to the extant fragments as a body. Recent investigations have showed that the versified smṛti is not very much inferior in antiquity to many sūtra works, and that the general hypothesis, which has passed almost into a literary canon, that every versified smṛti must have had a sūtra predecessor is hardly tenable.[2] Judged merely therefore by its form, a good part of the Bṛhaspati fragments may have to be assigned a very much earlier date than they can be given after a consideration of other relevant features which they present.

45. On pages 500 and 501, infra, will be found the names of persons or works which are found in the collected fragments. Of these Pitāmaha, Prajāpati and Aṇgiras are ancient writers, whose views have come down only in fragments. The only reference to Pitāmaha is in a śloka (p. 91) which says that 'in the words of Pitāmaha' he who undergoes the ordeal of the hot piece of gold (taptamāṣa), and whose fingers do not become blistered or tremelous, is declared purified. The earliest writer to cite this passage is Lakṣmīdhara (c. 1100 A.D.). But, a śloka ascribed to Pitāmaha is quoted by Mr. Kane (p. 227 n.) in which he declares that 'according to Bṛhaspati' the disputes of villages, associations (goṣṭha), town corporations and soldiers should be decided according to their usages. The verse occurs twice in Smṛticandrikā (Vyavahārakāṇḍa), p. 24 and p. 58 (ed. Mysore), where the second citation alone gives the name Pitāmaha. But among the recovered fragments there is no dictum of Bṛhaspati confirming the view ascribed to him in this quotation. On the other hand, the opinion on the ordeal of the gold coin attributed to him by Bṛhaspati is confirmed by a śloka of Pitāmaha given in the Smṛticandrikā (ib., p. 278) in which only the last quarter, which in Bṛhaspati is 'Pitāmaho vaco yathā', replaces the words 'nirvikārakarāṅguliḥ'. The assertion of Mr. Kane that 'Pitāmaha is later than Bṛhaspati' (p. 227) is open to question.

46. Angiras like Bṛhaspati condemned anything in conflict with Manusmṛti (Kane, p. 222). The only reference to him in a Bṛhaspati verse is in a śloka (p. 378) which declares that 'as laid down by Angiras and Āpastamba' a penance is imposed for hurting a cow. The

[1] Mr. Kane on valid grounds rejects the presumption of Mānava-dharmasūtra, as the original of Manusmṛti (Hist. of Dharmaśāstra, I, pp. 79–85). The generalisation, which is disproved in the case of Manusmṛti, was thus stated by Max Müller (Hist. of Ancient Sanskrit Literature, 1859, pp. 134-135): 'There can be no doubt that all the genuine Dharmaśāstras which we possess now, are without any exception nothing but more modern texts of earlier sūtra works on Kuladharmas belonging originally to certain Vedic caraṇas.'

corresponding dictum in Āpastamba-Dharmasūtra is available (Pādamekam caredrodhe) (I, 3).

47. As an authority Prajāpati is cited in Baudhāyana-Dharmasūtra (II, 4, 15 and II, 10, 71). He is also frequently cited by Vaśiṣṭha (III, 47; XIV, 16–19, 24–27, 30–32). The hemistich cited from him by Bṛhaspati relates to three days' pollution of sapiṇḍas on the death of a kinsman (p. 358). Vaśiṣṭha himself is cited by Bṛhaspati (p. 103) in a passage which gives the latter's view of the propriety of a money-lender taking five māṣās for twenty (kārṣāpaṇas) every month, in the very words of Vaśiṣṭhasmṛti, II, 51.

48. On p. 283 there will be found a śloka in which Bṛhaspati prohibits the celebration of the marriage within the same year of children born of the same mother, on the authority of a 'saying of Garga' (Gargasya vacanam yathā). Who is this Garga? The Mahābhārata mentions a ṛṣi of the name (XII, 49, 38) to whom Mahādeva gave the knowledge of the sixty-four arts (Kalā). Another ṛṣi named Gārgya is mentioned in the same epic as expounding the secret of Dharma, along with other sages (XIII, 190, 9–14). The Harivamśa mentions a Gārgya, who was a descendant of Bṛhaspati, as receiving from Mahādeva a knowledge of the sixty-four arts (XXXII, 15–20). Garga or Vṛddha-Garga is the name of an ancient astronomer, whose samhitā has come down with a chapter in which the Greek invasions are described in prophetic form. This work was held in esteem by Varāhamihira (Bṛhatsamhitā, xxi, 5), and is probably the one quoted for astrological matters by Jīmūtavāhana's Kālaviveka and Ballālasena's Adbhutasāgara. Bṛhaspati's citation of the view of Garga appears to belong to vivāha in a smṛti. A śloka from Vṛddha-Yājñavalkya quoted by Viśvarūpa (I, 4-5) includes Gārgya in a list of ten expounders of Dharma, among whom are Bodhāyana, Nārada and Pitāmaha. He also quotes two sūtras of Gārgya, one enjoining the abandonment of women who have become outcastes, or have publicly threatened to kill their husbands (I, 72), and the other from Vṛddha-Gārgya (I, 195, p. 136) to say that faggots and stones, like earth, can be used many times without impurity following such use. Kullūka cites (I, 6) Garga's sūtra that in cases of difference of view, one's own internal satisfaction (i.e. conscience) is the deciding factor (vaikalpye ātmanastuṣṭiḥ pramāṇam). Verses from Garga are quoted by Aparārka (pp. 124, 190, 368, 544). The smṛti of Garga seems to have been in both sūtra and śloka form (Kane, p. 119). The possibility of such a work having preceded Bṛhaspati's seems indicated by the nature of the quotations from Garga.

49. The opinion of Śākaṭāyana is cited (p. 363) that water in pān, fragrant powder, butter-milk, honey, oil and molasses does not cause impurity. The Smṛticandrikā quotes a śloka of Śākaṭāyana to the effect that the śrāddha of one who loses his life in water, fire, etc., should be performed on any day but caturdaśī (Śrāddhakāṇḍa, p. 367). He is also quoted by Hemādri, Śrāddhamayūkha and Nirṇayasindhu (Kane, p. 749). Bühler includes his name in his list of a hundred smṛtis (West and Bühler, Hindu Law, 4th ed., p. 27). If the verse in which Bṛhaspati is said to quote the view of Śākaṭāyana is authentic, he must be a very early writer on smṛti. The name has been known only as that of one of the eight grammarians.

50. Śaunaka is a smṛti writer who is one of the six named by the Manusmṛti (III, 16). On p. 227, infra, will be found a verse which cites Śaunaka's view that if one, who is a stranger, performs the funeral ceremonies of a person who has neither sons nor wife, he gets all the assets of the dead person. This quotation was ascribed to Bṛhaspati on the strength of a manuscript of Varadarāja's Vyavahāranirṇaya. The work has since been edited, and the citation is found to be by Kātyāyana (p. 441).

51. Gautama is referred to in a verse (infra, p. 208) on the appointment of a daughter as putrikā only after presenting burnt offerings to Agni and Prajāpati. This view was not held by 'others' (anye) who considered the intention of the father sufficient without the ceremony. The opinion of Gautama is correctly given as in his Dharmasūtra (XXVIII, 18) he rules thus: 'A father who has no male issue may appoint his daughter (to raise up a son for him), presenting burnt offerings to Agni (fire) and to Prajāpati (lord of creatures) and addressing (the bridegroom) with these words: "For me be (thy male) offspring"'. Manu (IX, 127) follows Gautama, except in regard to the homa. He is in accord with Vaśiṣṭha (XVIII, 17) in insisting on the stipulation with the bridegroom, and omitting the homa. This is also the position of Viṣṇu (XV, 5). Bṛhaspati places the putrikā (appointed daughter) on a par with the son of the body, thus making her the second, in the list of sons, arranged according to importance, and not the third as in Vaśiṣṭha (infra, p. 208, śl. 78) by declaring that with the exception of the aurasa (son of the body) and the putrikā (appointed daughter, treated as son, putrikā-putra) the other eleven sons are substitutes (pratinidhi) as oil is a substitute for clarified butter (ājya). By stating Gautama's view of the form of appointment and its criticism, Bṛhaspati allows an option (vikalpa), the intention being manifestly to push up the daughter's claims.

52. The famous verse of Parāśarasmṛti on the four smṛtis enjoined for the four yugas is included (p. 233)[1] as it is attributed also to Bṛhaspati by Ācāraratna of Lakṣmaṇa Bhaṭṭa. It is probably an old saying ascribed to more than one sage. A half-verse ascribing to Parāśara the view that tonsure, as a purification, is unnecessary when an uncle (on the paternal or maternal side), aunts (on either side) and certain others die, is not traced in Parāśarasmṛti. If it is authentic, it must relate to an older Parāśarasmṛti than the one now extant.

53. Vyāsa is cited as an authority for the statement that a tila-snāna is always good (p. 320). It is probably a citation from the Mahābhārata. A similar dictum in almost identical words occurs in the Mārkaṇḍeyapurāṇa (Śabdakalpadruma, II, p. 622) where it is stated that Manu quoted Vyāsa for the view (Sarvakālam tilaissnānam puṇyam Vyāsobravīd Manuḥ). The Mahābhārata claims to be a dharmaśāstra (I, ii, 384).[1] Bühler showed that it had won recognition as a colossal smṛti already between A.D. 300 and 500.[2] A citation from it will not diminish the claim to antiquity of a work like Bṛhaspati's. Many of the minor smṛtis are elaborated from episodes in the great epic.

54. The only reference to Uśanas, the legendary and literary rival of Bṛhaspati, is in the prose sūtra (p. 301) of Bṛhaspati found in the Bālakrīḍā of Viśvarūpa, which requires the mantrin (chief minister) to be master of the 'śāstras' of Manu, Bṛhaspati and Uśanas, as well as Daṇḍanīti. The implications of the reference have already been discussed.

55. The allusion to the case of Māṇḍavya, who was wrongly convicted of theft (p. 20), is a familiar instance cited by smṛtis. Nāradasmṛti (I, 42) merely gives it as an instance of a wrong conviction. Bṛhaspati makes a more effective use of the case, which is described in the Mahābhārata (Ādiparva, 116-117)[3] by pointing out how guilt and innocence will be revealed only after an intelligent trial, for want of which Māṇḍavya suffered. Kauṭilya knows the story of Māṇḍavya, which he gives in a slightly different form (IV, 8, p. 220) from the version in the Mahābhārata, but he uses it to establish the need for conclusive evidence for conviction. Kauṭilya enumerates a number of circumstances which might give the circumstantial appearance of guilt of an innocent person, before clinching it with a reference to the case of Māṇḍavya. Bṛhaspati is briefer and more to the point by drawing from the case the conclusion that a trial in which intelligence with imagination (yukti) has not been applied as certain to lead to miscarriage of justice: yuktihīna vicāre tu dharmahāniḥ prajāyate.

56. In number and in importance the references to Manu take precedence of all others in the Bṛhaspati fragments. There are six explicit references to Manu in the vyavahāra section, and two more in which Manu is obviously referred to as Bhṛgu, thereby showing that Bṛhaspati was conversant with the tradition in the extant Manusmṛti that it was recited by Bhṛgu (Bhṛgu-proktam). Besides these, there are four references to Manu, one to Mānavāḥ and one to Bhārgavāḥ in the samskāra section, one each in the ācāra, āśauca and āpad-dharma sections, and two in śrāddha. There are allusions, which are unmistakably to Manu, but which do not give his name. The way in which Manu's ideas are developed, or completed by Bṛhaspati, led Bühler to describe the latter's work as a vārtika or running comment on the Manusmṛti.[1] These are exclusive of a large number of verses and half-verses, which are common to both Bṛhaspati and Manusmṛti, and have been described so sometimes in quotations. The common element raises, however, a problem of a different kind from the allusions to Manu's dicta. A disposition to acknowledge obligation openly cannot be reconciled to the hypothesis that such common material must indicate appropriation or plagiarism. With one exception, they have all been found in Manusmṛti, and are indicated in the footnotes.

57. The first dictum of Bṛhaspati in the order of importance in showing their mutual relationship is the famous sentence 'Manvartha-viparītā tu yā smṛtiḥ sā na śasyate', i.e. 'the code which is in conflict with the sense of Manu is not held in esteem'. The hemistich is usually found with a first half which gives the ground of the pre-eminence: 'Vedārtha-pratibaddhatvāt prāmāṇyam tu Manoḥ smṛtam', i.e. 'Manu's authority is accepted because of Manu's words being closely bound to the sense of the Vedas'. It is preceded or followed, as in Kullūka's citation (p. 2), by the statement that logic (tarka) or reasoning and grammar shine only so long as there does not come in sight (as a rival luminary) Manu, the teacher of Dharma (infra, p. 233). The clause about the rejection of smṛtis opposed to Manu becomes almost a cliché; it is tacked to any statement which is authorised by Manu but challenged by others. Thus, the statement that position of samānodaka (those connected by libations of water) ceases after the fourteenth degree (samānodakabhāvaśca nivarteta ācaturdaśāt, p. 352, inf.) is buttressed up by the citation of the clause. But Manusmṛti

(V, 60) which defines samānodaka, states that it ends when births and names are no longer known (samānodakabhāvastu janmanāmnor avedane).[1] This is the reading accepted by Medhātithi, Kullūka and other commentators. The reading of Bṛhaspati will be inconsistent with the usual text of Manu. Vīramitrodaya agrees with him in ascribing the clause limiting samānodaka to Manu. The Mitākṣarā and the Mādhavīya assign it to Bṛhan-Manu, whose dictum recognises the interpretation in Manu's as upheld by Medhātithi.

58. The allusions to Manu may be dealt with seriatim. On p. 19, there is a śloka, which the Kalpataru ascribes to Bṛhaspati. It lays down that the śāstras of 'Manu and the like' should be upheld, not Arthaśāstra, and when there is a conflict between the two, the words in the Dharmaśāstra should be acted upon. The indication of Manu as the type of Dharmaśāstra conforms to Bṛhaspati's general deference to Manu whom he regards as the pre-eminent smārta.

59. In dealing with the reply to the plaint, Bṛhaspati is credited (p. 39, śl. 20, inf.) with the view that if the defendant, accepting the matters set up by the plaintiff, puts up (another) reasoned plea, then the plaint becomes weak (prapadya kāraṇam brūyād ādharyam tad). That this was actually the view of Bṛhaspati is shown by a verse of Kātyāyana (v. 170, ed. Kane) in which the identical words are used, but the fourth quarter is 'ādharyam Gurur abravīt',[2] 'the weakness was declared by Bṛhaspati'. Jīmūtavāhana rightly ascribes the verse to Bṛhaspati, but in his citation the last quarter of the verse is, as in the text, 'ādharyam Manurabravīt', 'the weakness was declared by Manu'. The Vyavahārasaukhya of Ṭoḍarmal gives the same reading. The reading of Vīramitrodaya (p. 78) is virtually the same, 'Bhṛgu' being substituted for 'Manu'. Lakṣmīdhara also ascribes the śloka to Bṛhaspati. While thus there is no doubt of the authenticity of this shrewd observation, which shows jural acumen, the ascription of the view to Manu as his source by Bṛhaspati raises, if it is authentic, as it seems to be, the question of the completeness of the extant Manusmṛti, which is poor in the treatment of judicial procedure, and in which the idea cannot be traced. There are other instances which confirm this suspicion. Thus, there are opinions which Kātyāyana attributes to Manu (vv. 231, 395, 715, 781 and 842) for which confirmation in the extant text of Manusmṛti is lacking, while there is an instance (about an alleged rule of Manu that thieves caught red-handed with stolen property should be banished, stated by Kātyāyana, v, 823) in which the view attributed to Manu is in flat contradiction to the view expressed in Manusmṛti (IX, 270, allowing a thief caught with stolen goods and with the implements of burglary to be slain). Such differences between the current text of Manusmṛti, which remains virtually unaltered since Medhātithi accepted it as authentic in the ninth century A.D., will tend to show that the works which show the variations from this standard text must have been composed a considerable time before the age of Medhātithi.[1]

60. The citation of Manu's authority on p. 84, infra, for a type of ordeal, which is not dealt with in the very perfunctory treatment of ordeals in Manusmṛti (VIII, 113–116), in a śloka of Bṛhaspati which Varadarāja has preserved is another instance. It is not unlikely that versions of Manu existed which dealt more fully with an ancient institution like divya (ordeal).

61. A striking illustration of Bṛhaspati's way of dealing with Manu is furnished by his treatment of the apparently conflicting statements of the Manusmṛti on the levirate (niyoga). Bṛhaspati is obviously against the practice of niyoga, the appointment of wives and widows to raise offspring to their husbands. He probably regarded the custom as lowering the position of women. But it had a considerable support in ancient texts and precedent. In the Mahābhārata we find cases of niyoga applied to a wife, when the husband was alive. Its use for widows, as described in the great epic, was even more common: 'A woman who has lost her husband makes the husband's brother her husband' (Nārī tu patyabhāve vai devaram kurute patim, XIII, 12, 23). In the epic there seems to have been no limit to the number of offspring that might be raised by a woman through niyoga. This made it virtually equal to remarriage. Later on, therefore, the application of niyoga was restricted to the raising of one son only, the birth of girls not counting. In the epic (Ādiparva, 126) there is reference to three sons being allowed to be raised by niyoga,[1] but opinion must have already been divided on its extension, and Kunti protests against submitting to it more than once, as a violation of Dharma (ib., 132, 63-64). Kauṭilya (III, 5 and 6)[2] allowed niyoga in its ancient fulness both to widows and to wives whose husbands were diseased.

1 The conclusion is in opposition to Jolly's unproved assertion that the text of Manusmṛti has remained unchanged, in its present form, since Bṛhaspati knew it. It is clear that the text, which Kātyāyana, who is later than Bṛhaspati, used was different from the text of Manusmṛti, which is now current.

62. Āpastamba attacked its spiritual justification, as supplying a son to the dead man, by arguing that the spiritual benefit would go to the begetter and not to the putative father (II, 6, 13, 8).[3] Baudhāyana's interdiction of it was only in cases where there were already children.[4] Vaśiṣṭha's acceptance of the practice was coupled with the prohibition of its application merely from cupidity (XVI, 57).[4] Viṣṇu-smṛti recognised the son born of its application (XV, 3).[6] Nārada-smṛti accepts the custom, and only provides legal safeguards against its misuse, by ruling it to be illegal if followed merely from amorous desire, or after it had resulted in the birth of a son, and, in all cases, where it was not previously sanctioned by the family elders (XII, 80–88).[1] Yājñavalkya (II, 127-128)[2] like Nārada insists on family authorisation, and if that had been given, the son born is to be treated as equal to the aurasa, the first among classes of sons.

63. The approval of niyoga by the last three smārtas mentioned above may not have worried Bṛhaspati. But Manusmṛti recognised niyoga (IX, 57–63) and permitted it. The principle on which its spiritual utility was challenged by Āpastamba was roundly met by the argument that the field (kṣetra) is more important than the seed (bīja), and that it is the owner who gets the offspring not the begetter (IX, 48–51). 'Men who have no marital property in women, but sow their seed in the soil of others, benefit the owner of the women; the giver of the seed reaps no benefit' (IX, 51). Manu merely insisted on family authorisation for validating niyoga in any particular case, and recognised the son of such niyoga as a legal and spiritual heir (IX, 120-121, 145-146, 162–165, 190-191). But, expressing a more personal view, Manu condemned niyoga as a violation of the eternal law (dharmam hanyuḥ sanātanam, IX, 64), as unrecognised in the mantras of marriage, and as a virtual widow remarriage which the marriage regulations do not mention (na vivāhavidhau uktam, IX, 65).[3] 'The learned of the regenerate varṇas condemn it (niyoga) as an animal-custom (paśu-dharma) which is said to have occurred among men only when Vena (an evil king) ruled' (IX, 66).[4] The contradiction in the Manusmṛti in regard to niyoga was taken as a proof of the revision which the code underwent, the prohibition being tacked on to the rules regarding the performance of niyoga 'when the practice fell into disuse' (Jolly). As the custom lasted long after the so-called revision, the reason assigned for the interpolation fails. The correct position was suggested by Bühler (Laws of Manu, p. xciv). He pointed out that an antiquated custom, which had not gone out of use, was first described and then rejected as unsuited to the times. This is roughly the position of Bṛhaspati. The men of the two first yugas were endowed with austerity (tapas) and wisdom (jñāna), but the people of the dvāpara-yuga (in which perhaps Vena ruled) and kali-yuga were weak through the shrinking of virtue in the passing of yugas. A reason not mentioned by Manu in justification of the rejection of niyoga is put into his mouth by Bṛhaspati, viz. that niyoga is unsuited for the iron age owing to the inferior virtue of its men.[1] The way was thus shown for the inclusion of niyoga among the interdictions of kali-yuga, kalivarjya, and Bṛhaspati's ingenuity in interpreting the apparent contradiction in Manu led to the disappearance of the custom, among the regenerate classes at least.

64. The allusion to Manu's having recognised thirteen varieties of sons (p. 208, infra) has to be justified by reading Manu's recognition of the putrikā (appointed daughter) in IX, 127–130, with the enumeration of twelve sons by Svāyambhuva Manu recited in IX, 158–160 (which omits the putrikā), or taking the putrikā as equivalent to a son of the body and adding the two to the eleven substitutes to the aurasa mentioned in IX, 180. Bṛhaspati's high value of the putrikā, to which reference has already been made (infra, para 51), is endorsed by Medhātithi[2] and other commentators (IX, 166) who explain the omission of the son of an appointed daughter as due to the fact that Manu had already declared her equal to an aurasa. The combination of statements occurring in different parts of Manu's code in Bṛhaspati's allusion shows that the verses in Manusmṛti, as now existing, must have been familiar to him.

65. Bṛhaspati's statement (p. 84, infra) that Manu has spoken of units of weight beginning with the mote in sunlight and ending with the kārṣapaṇa is an obvious reference to Manusmṛti, VIII, 132–136. Manusmṛti's transition from nikṣepa to asvāmivikrayaḥ (VIII, 198-199) is correctly described by Bṛhaspati (p. 125, infra) when after pointing out that Bhṛgu (i.e. 'Manu' in its present recension) spoke of deposits (nikṣepa) before sale without ownership (asvāmivikrayaḥ), he implies that Manu's treatment was brief and that he would deal with it specially, a claim justified by more than fifteen ślokas being devoted to the second and twenty to the first of the two topics. It is an instance of the duty which Bṛhaspati undertook to develop the treatment of topics perfunctorily dealt with by Manu.

66. On p. 80 and p. 304, infra, occur two ślokas which are ascribed to Bṛhaspati by a large number of writers from Lakṣmīdhara onwards. They give a list of nine ordeals, and end with the statement that they were all noted by Svayambhū (i.e. Manu). In Manusmṛti, there are only three verses dealing with ordeals, and they describe only two of them, viz. fire and water (VIII, 109-110). Āpastamba alone among the dharmasūtrakāras recommends the use of the divine method of proof (daiva, i.e. ordeal). Yājñavalkya and Nārada, as well as Viṣṇu describe only five ordeals. Resort to ordeals is common in primitive communities. It disappears with the perfection of methods of proof and the weighing of evidence. It is curious that the subject is missing in earlier and full in late smṛitis. Bṛhaspati's categorical assertion that all the nine had been dealt with by Manu suggests a lacuna in the Manusmṛti, unless we postulate a difference between a Svāyambhuva version and a Bhārgava version of Manu. Bṛhaspati (and following him Kātyāyana) distinguish between the compulsory and the optional application of the ordeal. For grave crimes, murder and violence for the determination of which there is usually a lack of direct evidence, the use of ordeals is compulsory. It is also to be used in cases where the evidence on both sides is nicely balanced. But the tendency in Bṛhaspati is to narrow the application, by prohibiting its use for specified persons, times and purposes. We ultimately reach a position approximating to the modern, that for want of evidence an accused must be discharged, and not left to be punished by the chances attending an ordeal. Thus, the Smṛticandrikā recommends the use of circumstantial evidence when direct evidence is wanting, and if even that is lacking, to leave the matter to the king to decide. This meant discharge, as with the awful threat of the sin which will accrue from an unjust condemnation, the tendency of the ruler in such cases will be to acquit. Bṛhaspati's scheme of divya is more complete than either Yājñavalkya's or Nārada's and is probably the result of similar treatment in the recension of Manu he used. He found different ordeals in use for different occasions, by different persons, both as a secondary and as a primary method of proof. As ordeals must have been rooted in custom, local, tribal or religious, he could not abolish them. He did the next best, comprehensively surveyed and regulated them, and also restricted their application rationally. Affinity to Manu is reflected in the spirit of conservation, and the jurist in the regulation and definition. The use of the treatment of ordeals as a test of a jurist's historical position is likely to be unsafe.

67. In another case also a comprehensive enumeration ascribed by Bṛhaspati (p. 331) to Manu is not confirmed by the extant smṛti. Manu is said to have classified śrāddhas as five: nitya, naimittika, vṛddhi, kāmya and pārvaṇa. The number and the names are not found in Manusmṛti. It deals with nityaśrāddha (III, 70–72, 81–83 and 283), māsika (III, 122-123), vārṣika including mahālaya (III, 273–282) and ekoddiṣṭa (III, 247-248).

68. Manu is credited (infra, p. 275) with laying down the maxim (in relation to the ceremony of making gifts) that one should give with eye, mind, speech and sincerity. There does not appear to be any verse in Manusmṛti which conveys the sense of this śloka, but two verses (II, 192 and X, 63) convey an approximate sense though neither will suit the context. Not improbably Bṛhaspati cited a gāthā attributed to Manu from the Mahābhārata or one of the old purāṇas.

69. The śloka (p. 378, infra) which has already been referred to as containing an allusion by Bṛhaspati to the opinion of Angiras and Āpastamba on the expiation for causing hurt to a cow (infra, p. 380) is in substance the same as Manusmṛti, XI, 108–110. But there is no reference to Manu by name in the allusion. The opinion ascribed to Angiras is found in a long prose passage attributed to him by Aparārka (p. 1096) as well as in a śloka (v. 160) in the versified Angirasasmṛti (ed. Ānandāśrama collection of smṛtis, p. 7).

70. On p. 381, infra, a śloka attributed to Bṛhaspati by Raghunandana (in Prāyasccittatattva) will be found. It refers to the full treatment given by Manu and others to expiations for sins great and small. The description of Manu's contribution to prāyasccita is correct, as besides the eleventh book of Manusmṛti, which is practically taken up with the subject, there are scattered references in the work to the topic (cf. II, 181, 187, 220, 221 ; IV, 198, 222; V, 20-21; VI, 69; VIII, 105-106; IX, 235, 240–242 ; and X, 211).

71. So far the explicit references by Bṛhaspati to Manu have been dealt with. Reference has been also made to an implicit criticism of Manu, who is not named in the criticism of the doctrine of the indivisibility of clothes, etc. (infra, para 12). Some other instances of concealed allusion may be indicated. On p. 101 (v. 17) will be found Bṛhaspati's view of the maximum interest permitted on corn, gold, clothes, etc. Bṛhaspati vaguely alludes to the rule having been laid down (proktā) by others also. Manu's limits are different (VIII, 151), and Bṛhaspati must have been aware of it and justified his differing from his model (un-named in this case) by a vague reference to his own view being that which had been laid down by others. He must have known that Manu said nothing of the widow's right of succession to her husband's property, though the subject is important. Bṛhaspati makes her heir to a sonless husband before others, and to justify what might have seemed an innovation he makes an eloquent plea for the rights of the wife who is treated as sharing the husband's puṇya as his other half, and yet is denied the right to succeed to her sonless husband. Such special pleading would have been unnecessary if Manu had recognised the claims of the sonless wife.

72. Other indirect references by Bṛhaspati to Manu have been noticed (Jolly's Nārada and Bṛhaspati, p. 273). Manu (VIII, 153) mentions four kinds of interest. Bṛhaspati (p. 100, infra) states that interest has been spoken of (proktā) as of four kinds, by others as of five, and still others as six, and calls on his reader to hear his own exposition (tattvatas tān nibodhata). Manu's recognition of the putrikā as equal to the aurasa (IX, 130) is affirmed with emphasis and implemented by Bṛhaspati (p. 207, v. 70, infra) who declares: 'Only one (eka eva), namely the son of the body (aurasaḥ putraḥ), is proclaimed (kīrtitaḥ) as the master of his father's wealth. His equal is the putrikā-putra (appointed daughter). The others are declared as entitled only to maintenance (bhartavyās tvapare)'.

73. Illustrations have been furnished already of Bṛhaspati's practice of amplifying, completing and explaining Manusmṛti. Some other examples may be given. It has been suggested by Jolly (Hindu Law and Custom, p. 57) that Bṛhaspati took the idea of eighteen titles of law from Manu, who does not however enumerate the eighteen, formally stated them and divided them into fourteen titles devoted to civil law and procedure and four to criminal law. The expression asvāmivikraya, sale without ownership, or as the Vīramitrodaya interpreted it, sale by one who is not the owner (Vyavahāra, p. 374), which Jolly declares as first introduced by Manu (Nārada and Bṛhaspati, p. 273), is not only adopted by Bṛhaspati as the name of one of the heads of vyavahāra, but he gives a comprehensive definition of asvāmi (infra, p. 125) as the sale in secret by one who is not the owner of an open deposit (nikṣepa), a bailment of delivery (anvāhita), a sealed deposit (nyāsa), stolen property (hṛta), or what has been borrowed for use (yācita). Bṛhaspati explains the four kinds of interest (vṛddhi) mentioned by Manu (pp. 100-101, infra). Manu indicated (VIII, 49) five ways of recovering a loan, viz. persuasion, law suit, cleverness, customary proceeding (ācarita), and force. The devices are explained elaborately by Bṛhaspati (infra, p. 114). Manu's contribution to the law of partnership consists (VIII, 2, 11) in an indication that the assignment of shares in a partnership should follow the practice in the division of shares of priests conducting a sacrifice in co-operation. After dealing with sharing of the gains of priests (infra, pp. 132-133) in three verses, Bṛhaspati develops the law of partnership among cultivators and craftsmen, and even thieves! (ib., p. 136). Manu's two heads of non-payment of wages and disputes between master and servant (VIII, 5, 215–218, 229–243) are elaborated as three as abhyupetya aśuśrūṣā (breach of contract of service), non-payment of wages (vetanasya-anapākarma) and relations between owner and herdsman (svāmi-pāla) and dealt with fully (pp. 140–154). The law of ordeals, resumption of gifts and violation of agreements, of which the treatment in Manu is scrappy, are elaborated by Bṛhaspati. He has recited the titles in Manu's order, but a number of subdivisions have been introduced by him. Numerous instances of his defining terms (e.g. Maula) used by Manu can be found in the perusal of his collected fragments. In its original form Bṛhaspatismṛti may have read as a running commentary on Manu's code.

74. The position of Bṛhaspatismṛti as half-vārtika and half-supplement (pariśiṣṭha) is well shown in the treatment of procedure (vyavahāramātṛkā) and in the non-vyavahāra sections, where they will be even more obvious. Bṛhaspati's lucid and full treatment of civil procedure made him (even after Nārada and Kātyāyana, who ran him close, were available) a favourite of digest writers. Thus, though Jīmūtavāhana quotes above twenty smṛtis in the Vyavahāramātṛkā, two-thirds the number of citations are from these three smṛtis. Some of the 'improvements' made by Bṛhaspati are noteworthy. In classifying witnesses on whom the smṛtis chiefly depend for adjudication of a suit, Manu (VII, 76) made a rough twofold division into nibaddha and anibaddha ('entered' and 'not entered' in the deed). Bṛhaspati realised that there may be witnesses of a transaction, who are as reliable as those whose names are in the deed, and he divided witnesses (sākṣiṇaḥ) into kṛta (i.e. appointed at the time of the transaction and asked to bear it in mind to give future evidence, if needed) and akṛta, and subdivided each into six divisions (infra, pp. 49-50). Likhita (attestor), lekhita (written up in the deed as a witness potentially), gūḍha (secret witness), smārita (one reminded), vadricchābhijña (casual witness) and uttara (indirect witness) are of the kṛta class; and in the second division come six classes of witnesses who, though not previously appointed, can be made to depose if they know the transaction. The classification is useful for evaluating testimony. Nārada ignores the lekhita, whose testimony must be specially valuable, as he must have been put in by mutual agreement of the parties, when the transaction was made. Bṛhaspati's advocacy of the use of upādhi, or yukti in trials,[1] which follows the injunction of a master of administration like Kauṭilya, has already been noticed. It is a warning to the judge not to be overcome by technicalities but go by probabilities.

75. In regard to the number of witnesses, Bṛhaspati shows natural caution by definitely rejecting a solitary witness (naikam pṛcchet kadācana, p. 49). But, following Manu, who, after declaring that a single witness is inadmissible (VII, 67), made an exception (VIII, 67) in favour of a holy man or one free from covetousness.[2] The underlying presumption in the exception is noted by Bṛhaspati and extended logically to others similarly presumed to be above influence, e.g. the court messenger, accountant, the chief judge, one who has accidentally seen the transaction and the king.[3] The inclusion of the king is interesting. Viṣṇu and Yājñavalkya modify the rule of the admissibility of a single witness if he was a śrotriya, by adding the rider that he must be acceptable to both parties (ubhayasammata). It is noteworthy that Bṛhaspati does not expressly interdict women as admissible witnesses, as Manu does (VIII, 77), on the ground that the minds of even good women might waver, nor does he include them.[4] Possibly the prejudice against the sex might have made the 'reform' revolutionary. Bṛhaspati, unlike Manu, Viṣṇu (VII, 2) and Yājñavalkya (II, 71),[5] allows śrotriyas to be

[1] Upādhi is the same as Upadhā in the verse of Bṛhaspati. The Kalpataru explains it as Yukti (उपधा युक्तिरिति कल्पतरौ, Vīramitrodaya, p. 224).

[2] Manu in enumerating ineligible witnesses (VIII, 63–68) excludes also the solitary witness. Kullūka explains that (as the reference in VIII, 63 is to persons 'made' into witnesses) the allusion is to one who is made the attestor of a document or transaction, and that the prohibition is due to the fear of the disappearance of the sole attestor by death. The rule (VIII, 77), एकोऽलुब्धस्तु साक्षी स्यात्, refers to non-attesting witnesses.

[3] Infra, p. 53, v. 20.

[4] एकोऽलुब्धस्तु साक्षी स्यात् बह्वयः शुच्योऽपि न स्त्रियः ।
स्त्रीबुद्धेरस्थिरत्वात्तु दोषैश्चान्येऽपि ये वृताः ॥ (VIII, 77.)

The rule appears to relate merely to the comparative value of the testimony of the evidence of women and of a non-covetous person, and is not a definite rejection of women as witnesses, especially as it is laid down that 'women should be witnesses for women' (स्त्रीणां साक्ष्यं स्त्रियः कुर्युः । VII, 69).

[5] Manu includes the Śrotriya and the ascetic (liṅgastha) among his excluded attestors (VIII, 65), as does Viṣṇu (VIII, 2), apparently cited on the ground that by their learning and virtues they would make excellent witnesses (infra, p. 56, v. 38).

76. Manu (VIII, 108) will impose a fine on a witness whose falsehood is revealed by divine wrath, as by his falling ill or losing a relation within seven days of his deposition. As this is an application of the principle of ordeals to testimony, Bṛhaspati wisely restricts the evidence of such calamities for use only against parties who have submitted to an ordeal (infra, p. 86, v. 46; p. 89, v. 65). Manu has a rule of dubious morality, allowing a falsehood to be spoken to save a life (VIII, 104).[1] As this rule occurs among rules of testimony, it is a wide sanction to perjure in cases of murder! He will let off the perjurer with a penance (VIII, 105), and Yājñavalkya (who condemns perjurers generally, II, 74)[2] accepts the precept. Bṛhaspati's modification of this permission is noteworthy: The witness is enjoined 'even by telling a lie to preserve a Brāhmaṇa, who has once sinned through error, and is in peril of his life, oppressed by rogues and other enemies' (p. 56, v. 43).[3] The use of documents is ancient, and is from the fear of the disturbance of their pious avocation by being summoned for evidence. Vasiṣṭha (XVI, 28) proceeding on the merits places the Śrotriya at the head of (good) witnesses:

Commentators affiliate these injunctions to Gautama's rules (XIII, 23–25):

मिथ्यावचने याप्यो दण्डचश्च साक्षी । नानृतवचने दोषो, जीवनं चेत्तदधीनम् । न तु पापीयसो जीवनम् ॥ Medhātithi (ed. Jha, II, pp. 118–120) in a long comment attempts to whittle down the immorality latent in Manu's rule, and Kullūka, following Medhātithi, would apply it only to cases in which a capital sentence in excess of the needs might be passed by a severe king (उग्रदण्डत्वाद्राज्ञः), and not to cases of manifest thieves and other irreclaimable fellows: एतच्च प्रमादस्खलिताधर्मविषयत्वे न तु अत्यन्ताधार्मिक-संधिकारस्तेनादिविषये । proved by the allusions to them in the dharmasūtras of Gautama (13, 4) and Vaśiṣṭha (16, 10–15) and in the Kauṭilīya (II, 11). Manu treats of them quite casually (VII, 76, 168 and 255). Bṛhaspati deals with them elaborately (pp. 59–69) in about 58 verses. Yājñavalkya is briefer (II, 84–94). Viṣṇu is a little fuller (ch. vii) and he mentions three classes of documents only. Nārada's treatment is not fuller (I, 10, 135–146). He divides them into two classes. Bṛhaspati has seven classes for private documents alone, and regards his list as illustrative and not exhaustive, by using the word 'ādi' (p. 60, v. 5). The greater elaboration of the details of procedure may indicate first-hand knowledge of judicial administration, and not necessarily imply that it is of later date than that of works in which the treatment is less full.

77. The detailed consideration of the relations of Bṛhaspatismṛti to Manusmṛti establishes the close connection between them, and the posteriority of the former definitely to the latter. This conclusion relates only to what the extant Manusmṛti offers in a comparative study of it with the available fragments of Bṛhaspati. It does not overlook the possibility of both having been available in older forms, and having undergone recasting. That the Bṛhaspati fragments may be anterior to the final redaction of Manu, which Medhātithi standardised, seems to be suggested by the citation of views from Manu for which authority in the standard text of his smṛti is wanting. It is possible, therefore, that in the reconstructed Bṛhaspati there are passages much older than the present text of Manusmṛti. But, taken as a whole, it seems clear that the bulk of the reconstructed smṛti, as the fragments of it have come down, is later than Manusmṛti, as it stands now, and the latter will furnish an upper limit to the composition of the recension of Bṛhaspatismṛti, the fragments of which are available in citations. As every writer whose name occurs in these is anterior to Manu's code, the examination of the names cited by Bṛhaspati, so far as is ascertainable, does not disturb the conclusion thus reached. Nor is its validity affected by the probability of a few elements, as for example the prose passages, being older than the model, and a number of ślokas being found in the collection, whose antiquity and perhaps even authenticity may be disputable. In view of this result of the investigation, it may be assumed properly that in all cases in which identical verses are ascribed to both Manu and Bṛhaspati, they were not taken by Manu from his follower.

78. It is necessary to make a brief reference to the presence in the collection of a number of verses in which Bṛhaspati's own name occurs. Four of these occur in the section on vyavahāra (infra, pp. 37, 38, 97, 157) and the other four in the rest of the book. It looks more natural for the name to be found in a citation by a later writer than in a genuine śloka of Bṛhaspati's own composition. Indian authors are, however, accustomed to make such an admission of authorship in statements, like the above, but the use is ordinarily restricted to cases in which they wish to draw attention to their personal responsibility, as when they dissent from the views of others. This is how Kauṭilya's name occurs in the Arthaśāstra.[1] Manu is quoted over a dozen times in the Mānavadharmaśāstra.[2] This is explicable on the basis of the story of the recitation of the smṛti by Bhṛgu (ib., I, 60).[3] The question is, however, not very material to the determination of the authenticity of Bṛhaspati's views, as they will be found equally in a citation with his name tacked on to it by a follower or by himself when he recorded his view, possibly having in mind some view with which he wished to mark his dissent. No Indian digest ordinarily rejects a verse which contains an author's own name as authorisation, or fails to quote it by his name.

79. There are eleven ślokas in the rebuilt Kātyāyanasmṛti (ed. Kane), in which Bṛhaspati's name is mentioned. Of these, five have been included in the Bṛhaspati reconstruction as they are found cited as Bṛhaspati's in digests. Reason has been given for the addition of one of the remaining verses to Bṛhaspati (yo arthinārthaḥ samuddhiṣṭaḥ, etc.) the form in Kātyāyana (v. 170) suggesting clearly the fact that he was citing, in almost his very words, a view of Bṛhaspati. The statement (ib., 346), that Bṛhaspati said that the testimony of a witness should not be accepted unless he was present at the time of the transaction along with the parties, is in line with Bṛhaspati's views, but the inclusion of this verse will make for tautology. It is obviously a résumé of Bṛhaspati's view by Kātyāyana on the particular point. A verse attributed to Kātyāyana by the Smṛticandrikā and the Vīramitrodaya has been included in his collection by Mr. Kane. It is to be found in the Bṛhaspati fragments (Vyav., 10, 112) as Caṇḍeśvara and Varadarāja treat it as a dictum of Bṛhaspati. The assertion in the śloka itself that it is Bṛhaspati's view may find support in the circumstance that the opinion is in conflict with the view expressed by others like Yājṇavalkya (II, 55) and Nārada (p. 81, Bahavaścet pratibhuvo, etc.).[1] A verse (v. 664) ascribed to Kātyāyana [2] states that cattle which trespass may be caught and beaten. This is somewhat in accord with Āpastamba (D.S., II, 11, 28, 5-6). It may have been a view of Bṛhaspati but a śloka confirming it has not been found in the digests under his name. It has therefore not been included in the present reconstruction. So is a verse (v. 718)[3] which attributed to Bṛhaspati the opinion that a Brāhmaṇa cannot employ one of his own varṇa to do slave duties, though each of the other castes can employ one of the same varṇa to do such work. A śloka ascribed to Kātyāyana by the Vivādaratnākara (v. 884, ed. Kane)[4] states that Bṛhaspati held that pasture, clothes worn on the body, money lent, and money set apart for dharma cannot be divided between heirs. This is in conflict with Bṛhaspati's own criticism of Manu, who held them to be indivisible (infra, p. 203) and his explicit rule that pasture land can be shared by the heirs (ib., p. 204: pracāraśca yathāmśena kartavyo riktibhiḥsadā). एकच्छायाकृतं सर्वं दद्यात्तु प्रेषिते सुतः ।

मृते पितरि पित्रंशं परर्णं न कदाचन ॥

Kātyāyana is credited with the above śloka by the Smṛticandrikā (III, p. 355) but with the ending परर्णं न बृहस्पतिः । Yājṇavalkya (II, 55) rules:

बहवः स्युर्यदि स्वांशैर्दद्युः प्रतिभुवो धनम् ।
एकच्छायाश्रितेष्वेषु धनिकस्य यथा रुचि ॥

Nārada (p. 81, v. 120) lays down:

अर्थे विशेषिते ह्येषु धनिनश्छन्दतः क्रिया ॥

Mr. Kane attempts to justify the attribution of this view to Bṛhaspati on the basis of an untenable distinction between clothes 'daily worn' and occasionally worn, the former being signified by anga-yojtam. He does not get over the rule of Bṛhaspati about the divisibility of pasture land.

sibility of clothes, etc., which is ascribed to Bṛhaspati by Aparārka (p. 726), may be found in this collection in section 26 of the Vyavahārakāṇḍa, though not in the order in which the verses occur in Aparārka. Mr. Kane's statement that the view attributed to Bṛhaspati is confirmed by this quotation may be questioned.

80. Mr. Kane has showed that Kātyāyana regarded Bṛhaspati as an author entitled to his respect, and follows him in several matters (loc. cit., p. xi). His verses 29 and 30, in which he mentions that vyavahāra has two aspects (i.e. dhanamūla and himsāmūla, or civil and criminal), has eighteen titles and 1,008 subdivisions, seem to show knowledge of Bṛhaspati's division. Kātyāyana does not go here beyond Nārada, who made 132 subdivisions of vyavahāra (op. cit., I, 20ff.). He is at one with Bṛhaspati in the estimate of the comparative strength of dharma, vyavahāra, caritra and rājaśāsana (Kāt., vv. 35–51). Kātyāyana (v. 284) like Bṛhaspati (Vyav., vi, 4, p. 55) divides documents into three classes. Bṛhaspati, following Manu, had suggested five ways of securing repayment of a debt (loc. cit., p. 114). Kātyāyana mentions four of these, omitting naturally the suit, as he makes the king take the responsibility to apply the means of recovery suggested by Manu and Bṛhaspati (op. cit., vv. 477–480). It is noteworthy that the second of his verses on the subject attributes to Bhṛgu (Manu) the dicta, and in some other readings to Guru (Bṛhaspati). Bṛhaspati's definition (p. 118) of agency (nisṛṣṭārthaḥ)[1] is developed to its conclusion by Kātyāyana (vv. 469–470)[2] in the declaration that a duly appointed agent is like the principal in regard to the matter for which he was appointed, and the principal cannot reverse the agent's actions. Four kinds of interest out of the six described by Bṛhaspati (infra, p. 100) are described by Kātyāyana (vv. 498–501), but it should be also stated that Bṛhaspati has stated that some divide interest into four and some into five classes. The definitions are not altogether identical. The extent of obligation of a son to pay certain questionable kinds of debt in Bṛhaspati (p. 118, v. 118) is partly covered by Kātyāyana (vv. 565-566) while the obligation of the paramours of the wives of deceased liquor vendors to pay the debts of the latter is stated in different words by both (Bṛ., p. 118, v. 119 and Kāt., v. 567). Similarity exists likewise in their respective treatment of valid and void gifts (Kāt., vv. 644–649 and Bṛ., p. 142, vv. 8-9).

81. In two respects Bṛhaspati and Kātyāyana are alike. Both quote the opinions of Manu freely and show an intimate knowledge of his code. Their explicit and indirect allusions to Manu or Bhṛgu are of sufficient number. Even a larger proportion of the citations of Manu's opinion by Kātyāyana are unsupported by the current text of Manu.[1] In some cases, in which the same passages of Manu have been quoted by both, it is open to surmise that Kātyāyana simply followed Bṛhaspati, who seems to have been his model as Manu was to Bṛhaspati. The previous writers whom he names are fewer than even the small number named by Bṛhaspati: the Mānavas and Manu, Gautama, Gārgiyas, Kauśika and Likhita, besides of course Bṛhaspati who is quoted more often than any other writer.

82. Between Bṛhaspati and Kātyāyana the difficult question of reciprocal quotation, which confronts us in the case of some smṛtis, does not arise. The citation is all from one side, and not the other. The śloka (infra, p. 106) beginning with the words anirdiṣṭam ca and ending with the words iti Kātyāyano 'bravīt is really a verse of Kātyāyana, according to authorities from the Kalpataru to the Vīramitrodaya and its attribution to Bṛhaspati by a single authority, the late eighteenth century digest Vivādārṇavasetu, must therefore be rejected.[2] In the enumeration of smṛtis, Bṛhaspati and Kātyāyana are usually named together, but whether this is accidental or due to some recognition of their relation it is hard to decide. If, despite his pronounced bias in favour of the position of women, the slender quotations on strīdhana from Bṛhaspati are not due to the accidents of casual choice of citations, leading digests and commentaries prefer Kātyāyana's elaborate treatment of the topic, it is possible to look upon the latter, 'which has attained classical rank' on the subject, as a deliberate completion of a treatment by Bṛhaspati by Kātyāyana in the manner in which Bṛhaspati frequently supplements Manu.

83. Medhātithi (VIII, 215) refers, in explaining Manu's dictum that 'one who contracts to do a piece of work, and fails to do it, though not incapacitated by illness, should not only be refused the wages promised but fined eight kṛṣṇalas', takes it to mean abandonment of work by a craftsman when it is half-finished, like digging a tank or building a temple, and concludes that the workmen must bear all losses on the principle of carrier's liability for breach of contract or for damage to goods carried. This principle is attributed to Kātyāyana as one to which he gave very extensive application. Medhātithi then proceeds to cite an opinion of Kātyāyana in prose, applying the above principle of carrier's liability (bāṇḍavāhaka-nyāya), that it applies to 'the case of any other, who having become involved in a piece of work by money (payment) withdraws in the middle (before the work is finished)'. This is explained by Medhātithi as making such a person liable for loss incurred by his default, and the sentence cited is stated as from the sūtra of Kātyāyana. This quotation raises the question of Kātyāyana's work being in prose as well as verse, or of there being two works of his on vyavahāra, one in prose and another in verse. There are instances of ślokas being referred to as sūtras, and it may be that the clause quoted as the sūtra of Kātyāyana is a prose paraphrase of a śloka, or it may show that like Bṛhaspati's work, which in all probability was both in prose and verse, this smṛti was also in that mixed form. The discovery of only one such sūtra from a lost smṛti, or a few sūtraṣ, will not warrant the rejection of either hypothesis (contra, Kane, Hist., p. 218).[1] Kātyāyana was not, like Bṛhaspati, known to Kauṭilya as a writer on Arthaśāstra and in his case a presumption of the existence of a sūtra work by him will be weaker than in the case of Bṛhaspati.

1 'One remarkable fact is' says Mr. Kane (Kātyāyana., p. x) 'that the views ascribed to Manu and the Mānavas (by Kātyāyana) are not found in the extant Manusmṛti.'

2 Its inclusion in the Bṛhaspati fragments is merely due to the desire to have this solitary citation of Kātyāyana, in a verse ascribed to Bṛhaspati, available for reference in a discussion of their mutual relationship.

84. The relation of Bṛhaspati to Manu and Kātyāyana which is established provides the two limits to the date of the Bṛhaspati-smṛti. Mr. Kane has stated[2] that Bṛhaspati is cited by Pitāmaha in a passage in Smṛticandrikā (III, 58)[3] which lays down on the authority of Bṛhaspati that the affairs of village associations, town corporations,

1 'All known quotations of Kātyāyana are in verse. When Medhātithi speaks of a sūtra and quotes a portion of it in prose, we must either suppose that he is referring to some other work of Kātyāyana than the one in verse from which hundreds of verses are cited by other writers or that Kātyāyana's work on vyavahāra also contains some prose passages. As hardly any other writer quotes a prose passage of Kātyāyana on vyavahāra, the second alternative appears somewhat unlikely' (Kane, op. cit., p. 218).

caravans, traders should be decided in accordance with their own customs. The authenticity of this ascription of a view to Bṛhaspati may be challenged, firstly, as no verse of Bṛhaspati containing such a statement in reference to these classes has come down, and secondly, because it is opposed to an express statement of Bṛhaspati that a king can overrule an established usage (caritrācāram) by his edict (rājaśāsanam), which will supersede custom (infra, I, 21, p. 4; II, 28, p. 287, Jolly's trans.). On the basis of this citation solely, Mr. Kane places Pitāmaha after Bṛhaspati (op. cit., p. 227). Reasons have been given earlier in this introduction to invalidate this conclusion (infra, para 45). On those grounds the śloka attributing the opinion to Bṛhaspati was not included in the present collection. Mr. Kane's further conclusion that Kātyāyana comes midway between Bṛhaspati and Pitāmaha on this ground as well as that of the less elaborate treatment of ordeals by Kātyāyana than Pitāmaha is not helpful, as the date of Pitāmaha is not itself definitely settled, and Bṛhaspati's treatment of ordeals (which like Pitāmaha he classes as nine) is not less elaborate than Pitāmaha's, while more elaborate than Kātyāyana's (Kane, Kātyāyana, p. xv). The result only illustrates the undependability of basing conclusions on the relative chronological position of smṛtis on the ground of the greater or less elaboration of the treatment of particular topics.

85. The only valid presumption open from the general agreement between Bṛhaspati and Kātyāyana, and occasional differences coupled with an attitude of deference to Bṛhaspati hardly inferior to that showed to Manu, is that Kātyāyana could not have been a contemporary of Bṛhaspati and that he must have flourished at least several generations, if not centuries, after Bṛhaspati. Lakṣmīdhara, Vijñāneśvara and Aparārka, who flourished about A.D. 1100, quote Kātyāyana as an ancient writer on a par with Bṛhaspati, Yājñavalkya and Nārada. An interval of several centuries between these commentators and Kātyāyana is justified by this attitude. The currency of Kātyāyana's smṛti about A.D. 1000 is shown by the citation of Kātyāyana's verse on the requisites of a proper royal rescript (v. 296) in the grant of the Śilāhāra king Raṭṭarāja, dated Śake 932, i.e. A.D. 1010-11.[1] Medhātithi not only cites Kātyāyana (VII, 1) but refers as we saw to a Kātyāyanasūtra (VIII, 215). Medhātithi flourished in the ninth century A.D. (c. 850). Kātyāyana must have preceded Medhātithi by a considerable interval, which may be counted in centuries. Mr. Kane's conclusion (p. xvii of Kātyāyana) that he cannot be placed later than A.D. 600 seems irrefragable. His further conclusion that he comes after Nārada, Bṛhaspati and Yājñavalkya and cannot therefore be placed earlier than A.D. 300 will require reconsideration in the light of the review below of the grounds of the similar assumption that Bṛhaspati is later than Nārada and Yājñavalkya.

86. The extant Manusmṛti is assigned by Bühler to the period extending from the second century B.C. to the second century A.D. (Laws of Manu, p. cxviii), and the conclusion is accepted by Mr. Kane (op. cit., p. 151). Mr. Kane differs from Bühler and western scholars on the question of the derivation of Manusmṛti which is in verse from a hypothetical Mānavadharmasūtra (ib., pp. 79–85 and p. 144), which he regards as not established (p. 85). His theory is as follows: 'Long before the fourth century B.C. there was a work on Dharmaśāstra composed by or attributed to Svāyambhuva Manu. This work was most probably in verse. There was also another work on Rājadharma attributed to Prācetasa Manu, which also was prior to the fourth century B.C. It is not unlikely that instead of two works there was one comprehensive work embodying rules on dharma as well as politics. There is one circumstance that points in this direction. The Mahābhārata quotes a saying (vacana) of Prācetasa which is almost the same as our Manu, III, 54. It is to these works or work that Yāska, Gautama, Baudhāyana and Kauṭilya refer whenever they cite the opinions of Manu or the Mānavas. The Mahābhārata also (particularly the earlier portions) probably refers to the same. This work was the original kernel of the present Manusmṛti. Then between the second century B.C. and the second century A.D. the Manusmṛti was finally recast, probably by Bhṛgu. That work must have compressed the older works in some cases, and expanded it in others. This hypothesis would explain why some of the verses and views quoted as Manu's occur in the extant Manusmṛti and why some do not' (op. cit., p. 156). The drift of evidence now available supports these hypotheses more than any alternative suggestions.

87. Assuming the correctness of the views of Mr. Kane on Manu, their repercussions on the problems presented by Bṛhaspati and Kātyāyana may be stated. There are citations of Manu by both, which are not found in Manusmṛti. They could have been quoted as Manu's or Bhṛgu's or as Svāyambhuva's (Bṛhaspati, infra, pp. 304, 360 and 280; Kātyāyana, vv. 231, 395, 413, 478, 555, 715, 781, 842) only if the extant Manusmṛti, even in a recension attributed to Bhṛgu, was bigger than it is, so as to contain these views. But the presence of citations from Manu or Bhṛgu which are contrary to the views expressed in the extant version (e.g. Kātyāyana, v. 649 which runs counter to Manusmṛti, IX, 231, and v. 893 which is contrary to Manusmṛti, VIII, 380 and IX, 270) can be explained only on two suppositions: first, that they had recensions of Manu which in some matters differed radically from the extant version which must have also been in existence but was not regarded as definitive, and that the earlier work was still available, either wholly or in fragments, and was distinguished from the popular version by naming Svāyambhuva or Prācetasa as the author of individual quotations. This will indicate a period for the extant quotations from Bṛhaspati or Kātyāyana, which appear authentic, in which the revised text of Manu had not been able to oust the older versions. They must be closer to the date of the revision of Manu's code than they would seem from their open veneration to Manu, which was not necessarily for a redaction then coming into wide use. The gap between the date of the revision of Manu's code and the two smṛtis will be narrower than usually held by modern scholars. The drift of evidence is in this direction, if other data are examined.

88. Over eighty years ago Sir Henry Maine (Ancient Law, ed. Pollock, p. 86) illustrated the weird fascination that general propositions had for jurists, and the involuntary assent and admiration that they commanded, without any investigation of their validity.[1] What he said of jurists and political writers, who developed strange doctrines from the Law of Nature, may be paralleled by the influence which similar general notions of the growth of jural ideas has exercised on those who have dealt with Hindu Dharmaśāstra. Their authority does not rest on wide inductions and on a correct comprehension of either the character of smṛtis as a body or individually, or their background, spiritual and social.

89. The isolation and individuality of smṛtis are usual assumptions now. While within a Vedic caraṇa it is conceded that there might be unity of thought or doctrine or ritual in its Kalpasūtra, such unity of aim or doctrine is not recognised even as an accepted postulate of Dharmaśāstra. Parity of view is regarded as an indication of borrowing or derivation, and not as an expression of a common heritage of ideas. Divergence of view in later writers is regarded, judged by modern notions of what constitutes progress or primitivism, as indicative of an evolution of legal ideas. The Hindu hypothesis of the unity of doctrine, ekavākyatvam,[2] the corollary to the hypothesis of the dependence of smṛti in the last resort on śruti, which furnished one-pointedness to Hindu jural literature, and which helped to fuse opinion and limit occasions for discord, is overlooked. The arbitrary division of Dharmaśāstra into schools,[1] which is an achievement of modern scholars, like that into schools of Hindu law is of modern legists, has been due to a misconception of the scope which a smṛti has for varying from accepted doctrine. It is rare to find an expression of revolt from accepted rule in a smṛti unless in still more ancient works the divergence of view expressed by the revolt finds a basis, and by a consequent option (vikalpa) the right to differ is conceded.[2] This is so in regard to fundamentals, while as to many details of ordinary human relations the wide freedom given from the earliest times to follow usage furnishes scope in regard to the field covered by actual law (following the sanction of custom) for a rich diversity of rule, enforcing and rendering uniform and definite, for purposes of administration, the law based on usage. One smṛti may differ from another in the degree of attention given to the recording of such usage or details of administration. A late smṛti may hark back to old usage and enunciate it dogmatically. A smṛti may manifest the desire for classifications and definition, while the generality of smṛtis, which knew that they will be expounded orally by persons conversant with the details which the smṛtis do not find it necessary to go into, will not indulge in such exercise. Oral teaching, which is at the base of the transmission of Indian doctrine in every branch of knowledge, will tend to crystallise into numerical statements the main heads of every important topic.[3] A smṛti, which seeks to help such oral exposition or prove a convenient manual of reference to the administrator, will specialise in definition and systematisation of the kind.

90. The use of classifications by some smṛtis and not by others (irrespective of their chronological position) may suggest to a modern critic, who believes that formalisation and classification are 'modern' qualities, an idea of the relative position in point of dates of composition which reverse their actual relations. Incomplete enumeration in Indian technical literature is not an indication of an imperfect knowledge of all the factors which should be enumerated. Oral exposition will correct omissions of enumeration. A peculiar form of treatment, which mentions only one or two instances, out of a large number, and leaves the full number to be inferred, is a characteristic of Hindu śāstraic works. It is most fully developed through the influence of Pāṇini, in grammar, and is known as the gaṇa system. Grammarians, who, according to a humorous saying, regard the saving of a syllable as of more account than the birth of a son, do not give all instances of a rule, but simply give one or two and add ityādi ('and those which follow it'). The application of the gaṇa system can be seen in the digests and commentaries on Dharmaśāstra.[1] But their rudiments are visible in the smṛtis, and defective enumeration of important classes is as often due to this prevalent practice as to the confidence that what was omitted will be supplied from widespread knowledge. The case of ordeals is an illustration. Ordeals are antique institutions, and mostly come under custom. One would therefore expect them to be stated fully in early smṛtis and to be neglected in those which were composed in epochs or environments that discouraged resort to them. It is just the other way. The clearest and oldest known reference to the practice of divine proof (divya) is probably that in the Chāndogya Upaniṣad (VI, 16).[2] Āpastamba (II, 11, 29, 6)[3] refers in general terms to the test but furnishes no details. Manusmṛti (VIII, 174) mentions only two ordeals.[4] Viṣṇusmṛti (ix–xiv) describes five; so does Yājñavalkya (II, 95 and 99) seems to know six. Nārada knows seven, as does Kātyāyana (vv. 411–461), who refers to 'lower ordeals' than the seven he enumerates. The full number of nine is given with an elaborate description of the procedure by Bṛhaspati (infra, pp. 80–93) and the fullest account is by Pitāmaha, who describes the nine, in about 200 verses. The application of the usual generalisation of chronological position being indicated by fulness of treatment will conspicuously fail in this instance.

91. Generalisation from literary form is not safer. Thus, Yājñavalkya's 'advance on Manu', according to Jolly (Hindu Law and Custom, p. 40), 'is evident even from the more concise form of its contents, which enabled Yājñavalkya to discuss almost all the topics handled by Manu in 1,009 ślokas instead of Manu's 2,684.' If the test be applied, Nārada, Bṛhaspati and Kātyāyana must be at least as old as Manu ! The usual assumption that the older works are in sūtra (prose), on which Viṣṇusmṛti was declared an earlier work than the extant Manusmṛti, is now challenged, and it has been suggested that a considerable number of Manu's verse statements are paraphrased or reproduced in prose by the 'later' Viṣṇusmṛti, which is placed not only after Manusmṛti but after Yājñavalkya (Kane, Hist., pp. 60–70).

92. Take another case of form. Nāradasmṛti is placed by Jolly as well as Mr. Kane before Bṛhaspati's work, and Yājñavalkya is placed before both. Bṛhaspati is diffuse when compared with either, and he is so because he makes fuller statements, defines more frequently than Yājñavalkya, and discusses the grounds of opposed points of view (e.g. niyoga, putrikā's right of succession, and the right of the sonless widow to inherit before collaterals). Exposition and discussion normally precede conclusion. Nārada gives no more indication of reason for any rule than does a modern code for a section. Yājñavalkya is very nearly so. On such a ground should not Bṛhaspati be placed before both ?

93. It cannot be argued that because Bṛhaspati's views on women's rights are more 'liberal' it follows that they are later than those of either of these jurists who uphold the old views. The opposed views must have been in the air from the earliest times. It is argued that Manu is silent as to the right of the widow, while Yājñavalkya gives her the first place among the heirs of a sonless man, and that therefore the former precedes the latter (Kane, Hist., p. 151). But, it is admitted (op. cit., p. 202) that Nārada, who 'is probably later than Yājñavalkya', and recognises nowhere the right of the widow to succeed to the property of her husband. Bṛhaspati is eloquent on her right, and argues the case, not as reformer but as a conservative who relies on the explicit statements of the śāstras on the wife being half the husband, the equal of the husband in dharma affairs, not merely in his view, but according to the Veda, the smṛtis, the opinion of ancient seers, and in the practice of the world (āmnāye smṛtitantre ca lokācāre ca sūribhiḥ, etc., infra, p. 211). Kātyāyana, who is admittedly later, adheres to the views of Manu (v. 928). Opinion continued divided in later times.

94. The application of the idea of progress implies that of a standard which is modern. We regard today a people as progressive in proportion to the elevation of the position of women in it. A system of jurisprudence, which claims its origin and sanction in revealed texts, is, to those who accept the hypothesis, perfect, and the only way to remove an evil is to discover that it has no real sanction in revelation. On the other hand, what is divinely enjoined cannot be evil. Take the instance of the immolation of the widow (sati). Viṣṇusmṛti (xx, 36) commends it but leaves it optional.[1] Kauṭilya, who is much earlier, includes it in his comprehensive condemnation of suicide (IV, 7).[2] Medhātithi (V, 156) took the line that suicide for women was as much interdicted as for men.[3] The later smṛtis of Angiras, Vyāsa and Hārīta (vide Aparārka, pp. 111f.) uphold it. The Īśāvāsyopaniṣad (3), which consigns the spirit of the suicide to a world of darkness (asūrya-loka), was against it, but Mādhavācārya (comment on Parāśara, II, 32) tries to explain away the Vedic interdict.

95. The authors of the later digests quote the authority of the minor smṛtis in recommendation of sati. This is illustrated by Aparārka's treatment of the subject (pp. 109–112), which he brings under Yājñavalkya's (I, 87) statement that the chaste wife obtains a good name in this world and salvation (uttamām gatim) after she dies. Angiras, Hārīta, Vyāsa and Viṣṇu are quoted in support of sati. Bṛhaspati's famous verse, showing the identity of feeling between the perfect wife and husband and describing the chaste wife (pativratā) as sorrowful when the husband is in grief, joyous when the husband is pleased, emaciated and slovenly in appearance when deserted by the husband and dying when the husband dies, is understood as recommending sati (infra, p. 193). That this inference is perhaps correct is shown by another verse of Bṛhaspati (p. 194) which describes the ideal wife (sādhvī) as half the husband's body

('flesh of his flesh and bone of his bone'), his partner in merit and sin, whether alive or following him in death (anvārūḍhā).[1]

96. Bṛhaspati has an exalted notion of what is due to a woman, from herself no less than from others. He maintained that the gods are propitiated in the house in which women are made much of (abhipūjyante), and wealth, good children and actions which prove fruitful follow (from the kind treatment of women) (infra, p. 192, v. 5). Women are declared to be pure (well-fitted) always, whether inducted in the management of the house (āya-vyaya-anna-samskāre), in its beautifying (gṛhopaskāra) and protection, or in religious acts like the tending of the domestic fire (śauce agnikārye). The wife is to be duly honoured by the husband with food, raiment and jewels, and on festive occasions (utsave) similarly by her parents, brothers, father-in-law and other relations (p. 193, vv. 6-7). It is characteristic of the high religious sanctity that Bṛhaspati attached to the married woman that he almost invariably alludes to her by a term (patnī) denoting her indissoluble relationship to the lord of the house (pati).[2] She is an excellent wife (sādhvī) who is over submissive to her husband (p. 193, v. 8). Even if she be sonless, her good conduct ensures her going to heaven (v. 15). The low estimate of the female character, which one finds in some smṛtis or popular literature, has no echo in Bṛhaspati, who, however, recognises, as does Kauṭilya, that her inexperience and seclusion render her subject to the risk of getting talked about, if she is allowed, even by those who are her natural guardians, to sojourn long in the houses of others by herself (v. 9), or grow into a termagant if not restrained in a friendly way by relations when she shows signs of self-will (p. 192, v. 1). The responsibility for her coming to harm in such cases is laid by Bṛhaspati on her male relations (p. 192, vv. 2-3). His rules recall the famous passage in the Kauṭilīya (p. 155)[1] in which Kauṭilya criticises his own teacher's concession that a good wife (sādhvī-jana) can be allowed to sojourn by herself in the house of a kinsman of her husband, by asking the pertinent question as to how so inexperienced a woman will know whether in a household of many males belonging to that kinsman, all are respectable.

[2] Pāṇini (IV, 1, 33) derives the word patnī (पत्युर्नो यज्ञसंयोगे) and holds that it can only be applied to the wife who is associated with the husband in the performance of a yajña and its reward. Accordingly, wives who cannot so join their husbands in sacrifices are not patnīs but jāyās or bhāryās. When the patnī is in menses, the sacrifice is interrupted (Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, III, 7, 1). If the patnī predeceases the husband, she takes away the 'sacred fire' and the sacrificial vessels are burnt on her pyre (Manu, V, 167-168). The wife of a Sūdra, who is ineligible for sacrificing, is a patnī only by courtesy or analogy, according to the Mahābhāṣya, II, p. 214.

97. No passages, like the famous rule of Nārada (naṣte mṛte, etc.) allowing a wife to remarry in certain circumstances (XII, 97–101)[2] which he attributes to an ordinance of the Creator (Prajāpati), have been found among the ślokas ascribed to Bṛhaspati, nor any allowing divorce (mokṣa) which Kauṭilya seems to allow except for those married by the first four forms of marriage, which are indissoluble (amokṣo dharma-vivāhānām, p. 155). Manu's rule, that in all marriages mutual fidelity should continue till death (anyonyasya avyabhicāro bhaved āmaraṇāntikaḥ, IX, 101), was apparently accepted by Bṛhaspati. The vacillation of opinion as regards what was due to women makes it impracticable to treat the growth of considerate treatment of women as an indication of the epoch in which a smṛti was composed.

98. It is necessary to consider Bṛhaspati's position within the limits imposed by his manifest obligations to Manusmṛti, more or less in its present form, and Kātyāyana's definite citation in relation to smṛtis usually placed within these limits, particularly those bearing the names of Yājñavalkya and Nārada. Jolly is definitely of the opinion that Bṛhaspati's work should be placed after both these. This view overlooks the mention of Bṛhaspati's name among expounders of Dharma by Yājñavalkya and the omission of Nārada from the enumeration. As already shown, Nārada's name does not occur in as many traditional lists of major smṛtis as Bṛhaspati's does. It is to be found in a supplementary list of ten expounders of dharma, which Viśvarūpa (I, 4-5) cites from Vṛddha-Yājṇavalkya, and in another citation it occurs as that of a upasmṛti. While Bṛhaspati is mentioned in the legends in both the Mahābhārata and the Skanda-purāṇa as one of those who condensed the original smṛti of the Creator, a similar story about Nārada only occurs in the perface to one version of the smṛti, while it is absent in the recension commented on by Bhavasvāmin. Indian tradition is thus predominantly in favour of the greater antiquity of Bṛhaspati. Both smṛtis show affinity in their views as well as in their language to Manusmṛti, and both contain passages attributed to Manu which are not to be found in the extant redaction.

99. As admittedly both Nārada and Bṛhaspati are held to be based on an original Manusmṛti, the parallelisms between the extant Manusmṛti and the two others may be held to prove their posteriority to it. Jolly enforces this conclusion as regards Nāradasmṛti by the greater number of categories and ramifications in Nārada, the 'fact' that Nārada made law (vyavahāra) by itself the subject of a separate work, by his differences with Manu being explainable on the ground of the greater 'advance made in Nārada's days in legal constitution', and by the great prominence he gives to writings and documentary testimony. Nārada's permission of niyoga, which Manu names and rejects, is not an instance of 'advance', nor his recognition of legalised gambling, in which he follows Kauṭilya rather than Manu. The argument that Nārada's exclusive pre-occupation is law is met by the tradition in Nāradasmṛti itself, in its longer recension, that what follows the preface is only one chapter of a much larger work in twelve thousand ślokas. Apparently, the claim is that like Manusmṛti the larger Nāradasmṛti had twelve chapters, and each had about a thousand ślokas. Nārada's fuller description of legal procedure, as compared with Manu's, may be held to reflect the great development in procedure, which had taken place between the epochs in which they lived, only on one assumption, viz. that each attempted to give an exact and full picture of the legal institutions in force in his day. Nārada's work is clearly a compendium for professional men, Manu's for scholars.

100. The special aim makes for a large volume of definitions and full statement of categories in Nārada. We have no independent testimony from literature or inscriptions to confirm what is at best a surmise. An explanation for the very large number of arithmetical indications attached to categories is this. When he speaks of 'seven good things' (I, 32), four parts of a trial, four parts of a judicial proceeding (I, 36), four forms of arrest (I, 48), fourfold answer and denial (II, 4-5), seven defects of a plaint (II, 8), twelve kinds of wealth (I, 24), eleven types of witnesses (XI, 149), four-fold law of gifts (IV, i, 2), seven valid and sixteen invalid gifts (p. 128 trn.), etc., he is simply furnishing mnemonic checks of the kind that are convenient to students and lawyers. It is the compendium-writer's speciality, and a substitute to the use of gaṇas, which presuppose mastery of the technique or paribhāṣa, without which they will be unintelligible or only imperfectly grasped. Ordeals and slavery are ancient institutions found in the most primitive societies in their greatest fulness and elaboration. Because Manu casually names two ordeals, and Nārada describes five, it will not be proved that a larger number did not exist in their days, or that others had gone out of use. The Pahlavi texts mention thirty-three ordeals as instituted by Zoroaster (S.B.E., 47, 74). Signs of progress should be sought more in the reduction of the use of the divine proof (ordeal), diminution in their number, and increase in the restrictions on their use. Kātyāyana's list of ordeals is shorter than Bṛhaspati's, and even he omits such an ancient ordeal as that of the heated axe to discover a thief (S.B.E., I, 108).

101. As compared with Bṛhaspati the following cases of greater elaboration of treatment by Nārada may be mentioned. The subdivision of the eighteen titles of law into 132 is peculiar to Nārada. Nārada enumerates the faults of a plaint as seven (II, 8); Bṛhaspati without enumeration (III, 8) deals with most of them. Nārada devotes 86 ślokas to the subject of ordeals as against 33 by Bṛhaspati. Nārada devotes 21 verses to ineligible witnesses and 30 to the exhortation of witnesses to speak the truth. On rescission of purchase and sale Nārada has 16 ślokas as against 6 in Bṛhaspati, and the treatment of boundary disputes is half as much longer as Bṛhaspati's. On the relations of wife and husband he expands to 114 verses as against Bṛhaspati's restrained 14 ślokas. The bias of Nārada seems to be to underline matters of importance to a commercial community. Nārada's sanction of the marriage of a Brāhmaṇa to a Śūdra woman may not be a throw-back,[1] but a recognition of a practice coming to vogue with influential Śūdras of seeking alliances with Brāhmaṇas for their women. The nun (pravrajitā) was more often a Buddhist than a Brāhmanical person, and the institution was originally Buddhist. It will account for the tepid condemnation by Manu[1] of intercourse with such unapproved persons, and the severe attitude of Nārada[2] reflects the conditions of an epoch in which such women had attained, as in Kālidāsa's dramas, social recognition and influence, entitling them to protection by stern penalties against those who seduced them. Nārada's frequent identity in view, and even expression, with the Kauṭilīya may be less due to deliberate borrowing than to the absorption of tenets which had come into wide use.

102. Some matters are peculiar to Nārada (Kane, op. cit., p. 202): the ways of discovering and establishing impotence, and fourteen kinds of impotence (XII, 8–16), the three kinds of remarried women (punarbhū) and four sorts of wantons (svairiṇī) (XII, 45–53), the details of constructive adultery (XII, 62–68), in which he seems fuller than Bṛhaspati, the elaborate treatment of the old question of seed and soil (bīja and kṣetra) (XII, 55–60), and his emphasis of the rights of a woman who is married to a husband unable to fulfil his marital duties (XII, 16–19 and 61). Mr. Kane thinks that Nārada was probably the first to fix the age of majority at sixteen (op. cit., p. 203).

103. A detailed comparison of Nārada and Bṛhaspati (whose views exist only in a fragmentary form) shows the greater artificiality of the work of the former and its deliberate attempt to attain wide influence by its systematisation of law and formulation of its doctrines as a code. The name dīnāra occurs in both, while terms like hodhā ('one's property when lost or stolen') are peculiar to Nārada. Both exalt the king, but the attitude to monarchy in Bṛhaspati leans to Manu, while that of Nārada appears to lean to the Kauṭilīya. The emphasis on individual rights is stronger in Nārada as in his enumeration of three who are independent (svatantra), viz. the king, the teacher and a man in his own house.[3] His views on the rights of women are less liberal than Bṛhaspati's, but as the cleavage of opinion is ancient, and he had the support of Manu on the subject, his silence (tantamount to rejection) as regards the widow's right to succeed a sonless husband, as compared with Bṛhaspati's making her first among heirs in such a case, is an indication of legal conservatism rather than of his preceding Bṛhaspati as a jurist.

[1] Manu (VIII, 363) classes female ascetics with slave women and 'criminal conversation' with them entails only a small fine.

[2] Nārada (XII, 73–75) treats intercourse with a female ascetic as incest, like adultery with a mother, sister, etc., 'an offence as heavy as the violation of the preceptor's bed' and for the crime no other punishment than the excision of the organ is deemed sufficient as an atonement.

104. As between them, the evidence is strongly in favour of Nārada being later than Bṛhaspati, and probably also Kātyāyana. A point not to be overlooked is that though Bṛhaspati and Kātyāyana (the former particularly) mention several previous writers, the names of Yājñavalkya and Nārada are not among those so named. Nārada is not in the habit of citing previous writers, the only exceptions being Manu (I, 250, 251 and 326), Vaśiṣṭha for his famous rule on interest (I, 99), which is also cited by Bṛhaspati (Vyav., X, 28), two verses from a purāṇa (I, 227-228) introduced (p. 106) in short sentence in prose ('purāṇoktau dvau ślokau bhavataḥ'), and the opinion of the Preceptor or Preceptors (Ācāryāḥ) in the enumeration of the eight things which cannot be given away. The allusions to Manu and Vaśiṣṭha do not affect the position of Bṛhaspati and Nārada, as they are also named by the former.

105. The reference to 'ācāryāḥ' is intriguing. Having stated that the things which cannot be given away are eight (aṣṭau adeyānī), Nārada proceeds to catalogue in two verses, on the authority of the Preceptor (ācāryāḥ), eight:[1] viz. an anvāhita (a deposit by a third person with instruction to be handed over to the owner), a borrowed article (yācita), a pledge (ādhiḥ), common property (sādhāraṇam ca yat), a deposit (nikṣepa), wife and children (putra-dārā), the entire property of a man with offspring (sarvasvam ca anvaye sati) and what has already been promised to another (yaccānyasmai pratiśrutam). The enumeration is contained in two verses, and the signification of their number in another verse (IV, 3–5). Bṛhaspati condenses the whole in one śloka (Vyavah., XIV, 2), using the word sāmānyam for sādhāraṇam in Nārada to signify joint property, and lumping anvāhita and nikṣepa under nyāsa (deposit). The identity of the two statements is noteworthy.[2] No similar rule can be found in Manu, Yājñavalkya or any other writer regarded as earlier than Nārada.

106. The honorific plural is proper in allusions to the names of distinguished sages, and even more to one's own teacher. Kauṭilya uses the term about a hundred times to refer to the opinions of his teacher, and this meaning has been correctly conveyed in his translation of the expression by Dr. Shama Sastri (p. 8 seq.). The two other interpretations suggested for the term in the Kauṭilīya are contrary to both usage and context. Jolly takes the word to mean 'previous teachers',[1] and Mr. Kane interprets it as 'the ancient authors of the śāstra collectively' (op. cit., p. 99). In interpreting the same word in Gautama-Dharmasūtra (II, 35; IV, 18), Mr. Kane admits that it is difficult to say who are referred to, and suggests (op. cit., p. 17) that the word means 'the general traditional view of most writers in that particular śāstra on a particular point'. Even this interpretation does not seem to be supported by the use of the term in Yāska's Nirukta, to which Mr. Kane refers. Thus, Nirukta, VII, 22 has madhyama ityācāryāḥ, and there is nothing in the text to suggest Yāska did not use it in the sense in which it is urged that Kauṭilya used it. The interpretation 'pūrve (v.l. pūrvam) nairuktāḥ' is only the explanation of the commentator Skandhasvāmin. In any case, the sense that it means 'the majority of previous writers', which Mr. Kane would assign to ācāryāḥ, is a forced sense. If, as Jolly contended, it meant all previous writers, there is no point in Kauṭilya's distinguishing the views of his ācāryāḥ from those of others (apare) as on p. 164, when he reviews the conflicting opinions that if one sows his seed in another's field, the product (offspring) belongs to the owner of the field (kṣetriṇaḥ) which is the position held by the Ācāryāḥ, and that the mother is only a receptacle (bastrā), and his is the offspring whose is the seed, which is the view of others (apara). Kauṭilya holds that it belongs to both. Again on p. 261, he distinguishes the views of Ācāryāḥ from those of Vātavyādhi (Uddhava) on the number of elements in State policy. Again on p. 322, he distinguishes his own views on the relative gravity of calamities to a state (vyasana) from those of both Ācāryāḥ and Bhāradvāja (Droṇācārya).

107. Both interpretations also run counter to an authoritative definition of ācārya by Manu himself (II, 140)[2] and its explanation by Medhātithi. According to Manu there are four classes of venerated persons in regard to a Brāhmaṇa. They are his ācārya, upādhyāya, ṛtvik and guru. The ācārya is he who teaches his pupil the Veda, together with the Kalpa and secret doctrine (rahasya). The upā- dhyāya is he who, for a livelihood, teaches a pupil a portion only of the Veda as also the angas of the Veda (II, 141). The guru is one who does the garbādhāna (planting the seed) and first feeding (anna-prāśanam), and thus it will be naturally the father who will be entitled to be called guru (II, 142). He who performs the sacrifices, domestic and others for one is his priest (ṛtvik) (II, 143). Among the elders of a person the relative pre-eminence is indicated by Manu thus (II, 145). The ācārya is ten times greater than the upādhyāya; the father or guru is worth a hundred ācāryas; and the mother is worth a thousand fathers.[1] A verse of Dakṣasmṛti paraphrases the sentiment of Manu. The significance of the definition is that all knowledge from the Veda downwards, according to the commentators, should be communicated to his pupil by the ācārya. Medhātithi, for instance, says that Kalpa stands for all the subsidiary sciences, and rahasya means the Upaniṣads. 'As a matter of fact', says he, 'people make use of these names on the basis of certain qualifications; and this particular matter has not been dealt with by Pāṇini and other writers on the subject of the meaning of words. What the present text (of Manu) says regarding the meaning of the titles is based, like the work (smṛti) of Pāṇini and others, upon usage.'[2]

108. Manu's authoritative statement should bind every one, particularly the author of a smṛti like Nārada. The specific relation signified in the definition must therefore be postulated between him and the writer alluded to as ācāryāḥ, in the usual honorific plural applied to persons entitled to the utmost veneration. In this case a specific doctrine is ascribed by Nārada to this distinguished personage, and that doctrine is so far found only in Bṛhaspati. He must therefore be the person referred to as ācāryāḥ in this context. Guru is another name for Bṛhaspati, and he is the preceptor par excellence, being the ācārya of Indra and the gods. If he is referred to as Guru,

It may be noticed that the great grammarian is referred to, as by Patañjali, over thirty times, as 'Ācārya' Pāṇini. Patañjali refers four times to Kātyāyana by the title. The promulgator of a śāstra, if not a sage, was apparently referred to by 'ācārya' prefixed to his name.

in the way in which Kātyāyana sometimes refers to him,[1] there might seem a suggestion that he is the father and not the preceptor, in the terms of Manu's definition. This will suggest another reason, if a personal relation as preceptor and pupil cannot be established between Bṛhaspati and Nārada, to justify the reference to him as ācāryāḥ. The possibility of the two jurists being contemporaries, say one generation removed, is suggested by Mr. Kane himself, who concludes his discussion of the date of Bṛhaspati thus: "So, he is probably a contemporary of, or not much later than, Nārada". (op. cit., p. 209). In the light of the arguments adduced above, Bṛhaspati will appear to be the elder contemporary in such a case. The conclusion is in line with the probabilities.

109. To remove possibility of persistence of disagreement with the interpreteation suggested, it may be useful to illustrate literary usage in regard to the term. The ācārya is expected to give a pupil his entire education from the rudiments to the Veda, philosophy and the sciences. The task is possible only for persons endowed with extraordinary learning, of a many-sided character. That such persons existed seems to be indicated by a circumstance which has been explained elsewhere. It is known that Kauṭilya refers to some schools, like Bhāradvājas, Pārāśaras and Bārhāspatyāḥ. They are obviously authors of works on Arthaśāstra or combined Arthaśāstra and Dharmaśāstra. Smṛtis ascribed to all these exist. Works on astrology or astronomy exist bearing the names of all these three. The school of Bharadvāja is known in the literature of grammar and rasāyana (chemistry). Bṛhaspati is known as the founder of a school of philosophical materialisim. 'Taken with the proofs of versatile knowledge to be found in our early sūtra and bhāṣya literature relating to Arthaśāstra, Vyākaraṇa and Kāmaśāstra, these facts may tend to support the hypothesis that the "schools" were engaged in giving instruction is a circle of sciences, and were not composed of specialists, who confined themselves to single subjects or sciences' (Ancient Indian Polity, p. 131). Such an ideal will be in accord with the concept implicit in Manu's definition of ācārya and with the presence in smṛtis of such extraneous knowledge on astronomy, anatomy, medicine, etc. Even today there are men eminent in more than one śāstra, who teach their pupils from the rudimentary to the most advanced stages in more than one śāstra.[2]

110. The relative position of Bṛhaspati to Yājñavalkya requires consideration. Yājñavalkyasmṛti excels all smṛtis in its compactness which it has secured without dropping the chief topics of a dharmasamhitā. Its flowing verse, orderly arrangement and lucidity have made it a favourite with bhāṣya writers who seek to furnish a digest of law and ritual in the form of a running commentary on a well-known smṛti. It is shorter than Nāradasmṛti, even though the latter confines itself only to vyavahāra with a short excursus of eleven ślokas to āpad-dharma for Brāhmaṇas, and contains on the whole fewer ślokas than even the vyavahāra fragments of Bṛhaspati or Kātyāyana will amount to. It is easier to memorise than other smṛtis and therefore easier to quote. Its vogue for a long time made it impossible for any other smṛti to compare with it in the reception of its doctrines. Without formal recognition of primacy, such as was conceded to Manusmṛti in the famous dictum of Bṛhaspati, it has nearly superseded the latter for everyday reference.

111. Its relation to Manusmṛti and Viṣṇusmṛti has been established by comparative study, and it is generally accepted as posterior not only to the Manusmṛti but even the sūtra core of Viṣṇusmṛti, though Mr. Kane does not accept the last conclusion (p. 65) and holds that the sūtras of Viṣṇusmṛti represent a rendering into prose of passages from both Manu and Yājñavalkya. As the latter mentions Viṣṇu among his predecessors, it is presumed that he must have had a much earlier version of Viṣṇusmṛti, which has parts distinctly like the earliest sūtra works on dharma. It is worth remembering that Bṛhaspati is also mentioned by Yājñavalkya, while Bṛhaspati's fragments, which name Manu, Vaśiṣṭha and Viṣṇu, contain no reference to Yājñavalkya. Mr. Kane declares that 'the correspondence of Yājñavalkya's words with the text of Manu is in most cases very close, so much so that one cannot help feeling that Yājñavalkya had the Manusmṛti before him and purposely made an attempt to abridge the somewhat loose expressions of Manu' (op. cit., p. 176).

The teachers, who condensed Bhagavad-Bodhāyana's extensive commentary on the Brahmasūtras are referred to as pūrvācāryas, not as ācāryas. Venkaṭanātha or Vedānta-Deśika, the Śri-Vaiṣṇava polyhistor and saint, refers to the earlier apostles by name only, e.g. Yāmuna-muniḥ, Rāmānuja-muniḥ, Nāthamuniḥ, Sudarśana-sūri, Bhaṭṭa-Parāśara-pādāḥ, Varadanārāyaṇa-bhaṭṭarakāḥ, etc. When he uses the term Ācāryāḥ, it is only in reference to his own teacher. The honorific plural may be noted. It is contrary to correct Indian usage to apply the term to any but to one's own teacher, and only to that teacher from whom the Veda, smṛti, religion and philosophy were learnt.

112. There are topics on which Manu is silent, which Yājñavalkya deals with, and vice versa. The worship of the planets and Vināyaka as well as the anatomical details and medical knowledge, displayed in III, 75–108, are features which distinguish him not only from Manu but from Bṛhaspati also. His outlook is generally conservative on religious matters, and his treatment of penances is fuller than Manu's and even Bṛhaspati's, who has only 70 ślokas on prāyasccitta as against more than three times the number in Yājñavalkya. The treatment of karmavipāka is conspicuous in Yājñavalkya but is wanting in Bṛhaspati.[1] These are indications of antique features in the latter, which is usually declared to be posterior to Yājñavalkya on the ground that Bṛhaspati's descriptions of procedure and law reflect a development on that of Manu, Yājñavalkya and even Nārada.

113. In referring to such things as Yājñavalkya's not dealing with cases in which witnesses are unnecessary, or with such topics as the secular doctrine of gifts and of reward, slavery, salary, impotency and its cure, irregular wives, divorce, defamation, gambling and betting, and confiscation and methods of detection or crimes, which are dealt with by Nārada however, Jolly's inference is that they were all unknown to Yājñavalkya, being developments after his age.[2] Jolly's further line of argument in favour of Nārada being later than Yājñavalkya is the greater wealth of detail in the former (pp. 47-48, op. cit.). Some of these topics are far older than Yājñavalkya and may be found for instance in the Kauṭilīya. It is an extreme use of the argument from silence to infer that omission to mention certain things indicates either that the things did not then exist or that they were unknown to the person who has not mentioned them. Such an inference requires a postulate that every writer should be presumed to be equally alert and filled with a desire to make the fullest and most complete enumeration and statements on every topic, independently of differences in literary taste, capacity or submission to conventions of writing.

114. The difficulties in predicating such development in doctrine of a marked kind between one smṛti and another may be seen, if one takes into consideration the dates for such smṛtis which those who apply the tests now assign to them. Thus, Manusmṛti is assigned by Bühler (Laws of Manu, p. cxvii) and Mr. Kane (op. cit., p. 151) to a period between the second century B.C. and the second century

A.D. As regards Yājṇavalkya, Mr. Kane's conclusion is that 'we shall not be far from the truth if we place his smṛti somewhere between the first century B.C. and the third century of the Christian era' (op. cit., p. 184). As regards Nārada (whose treatment is said to show 'marked development in law after Yājṇavalkya', according to Jolly), Mr. Kane concludes that he must have flourished nearly at the same time as Yājṇavalkya or 'somewhat later' (op. cit., p. 203). On the date of Bṛhaspati, who has been assumed on mere impression to be later than Nārada, Mr. Kane's conclusions show some variation. On p. 210 of his History, he concludes that Bṛhaspati cannot be placed later than the fourth century A.D., and 'must have flourished between 200 and 400 A.D.' The sections of Bṛhaspati on ācāra and prāyasccitta are ascribed to the period between A.D. 300 and 500 (op. cit., p. 126). The period in which such rapid developments of legal procedure and doctrine are held to have become reflected in smṛtis, which recorded them, is the troubled epoch between the fall of the Śunga empire and the foundation of the Gupta empire, in which the invader was never out of the land and the country saw the crumbling of the old empire and was in the birth throes of a new one.[1]

115. Important issues are raised by the ascription of certain verses to Bṛhaspati by some writers, and to other smṛtikāras by other writers. Sometimes, the same verses are cited as from both Bṛhaspati and another named smṛti. In the footnotes and appendices of this book cases of such ascription, so far as the vyavahāra section is concerned, have been noted. Some verses attributed to Bṛhaspati by certain commentators or digests are cited by other writers anonymously, or with the bald statement that they are found in 'a smṛti' (smṛtyantare, e.g. p. 94, v. 4; p. 97, v. 121; and p. 126, v. 4, infra).

116. Seventy-six verses, which on authority have been included in the present collection as Bṛhaspati's, dealing with vyavahāra matters are assigned by writers of repute to Kātyāyana. Aparārka (p. 639) seems to attribute to Kātyāyana verse 142 on p. 23, infra, beginning with the word apragalbha, but this is not certain, as it occurs along with another verse in the midst of a comment on a verse quotation from Kātyāyana and immediately before a citation expressly described as from Kātyāyana. It is identical with a śloka in Śukranīti (IV, v, v. 109). Verse 145 on p. 24 is cited by the Mitākṣarā

[1] How generalisations can be turned is illustrated by Meyer's view that Nārada is far older than Manu and Yājṇavalkya—older than even Gautama—and that the 'advanced views of Nārada prove nothing because he is a practical politician whereas the others are dilettantes'.

(II, 5) as from 'a smṛti' (smṛtyantara), and anonymously by Aparārka (p. 605), while it is assigned to Kātyāyana by the Smṛticandrikā (III, p. 70), Vyavahāramātṛkā (p. 286) of Jīmūtavāhana, Parāśara-Mādhavīya (III, p. 52) and Vīramitrodaya (p. 47). Verse 8 on p. 30 (aprasiddham sadoṣam ca, etc.) appears anonymously in Viśvarūpa (II, 6) and the Mitākṣarā, as 'in a smṛti' in Vyavahāramayūkha (p. 13, ed. Kane), definitely as Bṛhaspati's with the readings of Viśvarūpa in the Kalpataru, Vyavahāramātṛkā (p. 295) and the Vīramitrodaya commentary on Yājñavalkyasmṛti (p. 400), and equally definitely as Kātyāyana's in the Vīramitrodaya (ed. Jībānanda, p. 66) and the Parāśara-Mādhavīya (III, p. 61). It is interesting to note that the common author of the two Vīramitrodayas ascribes the verse in one to Bṛhaspati and in another to Kātyāyana. Verse 1 on p. 36 is assigned explicitly to both writers by Ṭoḍarmal and Vācaspati. Verse 12 on p. 47 is assigned to Bṛhaspati by Vācaspati in his Kṛtyacintāmaṇi, but Aparārka (p. 690) Mādhava (iii, p. 88) and Jīmūtavāhana (op. cit., p. 306) give it to Kātyāyana. Sometimes half a śloka alone is assigned to Kātyāyana combined with the half of another verse (e.g. infra, second half of verse 18 joined to the first half of v. 17 on p. 82 is ascribed to him by Aparārka, p. 695). In such cases of combination it is seen that the quoter missed the intervening parts of the two ślokas so combined. There are three similar instances of combined halves of Bṛhaspati ślokas ascribed to Kātyāyana (e.g. p. 167, vv. 47-48; p. 185, vv. 14-15; and pp. 198-199, vv. 21-22).

117. Kātyāyana is a declared follower of Bṛhaspati, whom he quotes frequently by name. That he should appropriate without acknowledgment as many as 76 ślokas from Bṛhaspati is incredible. As he could not be stigmatised as a plagiarist, other explanations of the proved identity have to be considered. Three are possible. Firstly, even in Kātyāyana's days the text of the smṛti of Bṛhaspati was not available in its original and complete form; and a number of his sayings had become added to the large body of floating ślokas, which were quoted without troubling to find out their authorship, and Kātyāyana utilised these ślokas, which were later on taken to be his, and that he did so not knowing that they were Bṛhaspati's. Secondly, Bṛhaspati may have himself utilised in the same way much floating matter, and the verses now found to be common to him and to Kātyāyana came from a common and anonymous source. The first of the alternatives would put Bṛhaspati at a great distance in time before Kātyāyana, to allow of the earlier writer's work to have become dismembered, just as Kātyāyana's own work also became in course of time. The second alternative will imply acceptance of a literary convention that the floating material was available to any smṛti for incorporation. The third explanation, which assumes that such cases of identity are due to faulty quotation, requires separate consideration.

118. So far as regards identity of ślokas among the verses claiming to be cited from either Bṛhaspati or his declared follower. Cases of identity of his reputed utterances with verses in his ideal, the Manusmṛti, may next be considered. In the vyavahāra section alone fifteen ślokas have been found which are attributed by some writers to Manu, and of these fourteen have been found in the Manusmṛti. They are noticed in the appendix containing additions to the footnotes (infra, pp. 502–536). Only one verse (p. 198, v. 18 beginning samavetaistu yat prāptam) which Kamalākara assigns to Manu has not been traced in the Manusmṛti. As Manu is the model of the author of Bṛhaspatismṛti, the presence of the fourteen passages of Manusmṛti in the latter may be explained in one or more of the following ways: by the theory of a common source for both smṛtis; by accident of composition, resulting in complete verbal identity, when the same ideas were sought to be conveyed in verse by two writers; by deliberate copying by Bṛhaspati from Manu, omitting to indicate the source, accidentally or deliberately; by the disappearance of verses of Bṛhaspati introducing the quotations from Manu; and by the unconscious reproduction by one who had assimilated the Manusmṛti. In mediæval times, the wholesale appropriation of the subject-matter of earlier writings was not uncommon even among respectable and able commentators and authors of digests. Caṇḍeśvara, Hemādri and Vācaspati have appropriated large slices of the Kalpataru of Lakṣmīdhara. Kullūka appropriated a good deal of matter from the earlier commentators of Manu, especially Medhātithi and Govindarāja. A smṛti which borrowed the ideas or doctrines of an earlier smṛti may have considered it not wrong to express them in the very words of the original.

119. One verse only (p. 197, v. 15 beginning samanyūnādhikā is ascribed, among those generally accepted as Bṛhaspati's, to Yājñavalkya as well as Nārada in the Vivādaratnākara (p. 468), but it is not to be found in either smṛti. This has to be specially noted in view of their common drift.

120. As regards Nārada, the absence of the verse in the printed edition of his smṛti is capable of explanation. Many versions of Nāradasmṛti have been current and many verses attributed to Nārada are absent in the printed text. Careful writers like Aparārka, Vijñāneśvara, Jīmūtavāhana, Devaṇṇa Bhaṭṭa, Mādhava, Śūlapāṇi, Caṇḍeśvara, Varadarāja, Pratāparudra, Ṭoḍarmal, Dalapati and Mitramiśra have ascribed about thirty verses to Nārada which others have attributed to Bṛhaspati. Of these only five are found in the printed text of Nārada. A fuller work of Nārada may therefore be presumed to have been available. The relatively insignificant number of Bṛhaspati verses which are traced in Nāradasmṛti may have a bearing on the question of its alleged priority to Bṛhaspati's work, and might indicate the virtual contemporaneousness of the three writers.

121. The attribution of verses of Bṛhaspati to minor smṛtis, which have not descended to us in their original form or are available only in quotations, may be explained by the possibility of the later smṛtis having borrowed from Bṛhaspati or of having drawn upon a common reservoir. In the case of writers like Vyāsa (between whom and Bṛhaspati nine verses would seem to be common), Sumantu (one verse similarly), Devala (one verse), Pitāmaha (two verses) and Prajāpati (three verses), the second of the above explanations is more probable.

122. An explanation which will meet effectively, if it can be accepted as correct, all such cases of the ascription of dual or multiple authorship to the same verses is that such ascriptions are due to errors in quoting. This explanation will also explain the failure to find in printed texts many citations from the works in question. A valid application of the hypothesis to cases of absence in extant recensions of smṛti passages cited from them by writers of authority will carry two implications: that the works as they now exist represent their authentic texts; and secondly, that erroneous citation is a widespread habit of even learned commentators. The point may be illustrated. Fuehrer's edition of Vaśiṣṭhasmṛti gives in an appendix many passages attributed to Vaśiṣṭha by commentators of eminence like Vijñāneśvara, Aparārka, Devaṇṇa Bhaṭṭa, Mādhava, Mitramiśra, Kamalākara and Nīlakaṇṭha.[1] Further exploration is sure to reveal many more passages of the kind. These are now found in prose as well as verse, and are not of the kind easily carried and stored in one's memory. The marvellous powers of memory among Indian scholars may be conceded. But even they could hardly be presumed equal to the task of remembering thousands of scattered sūtras and ślokas, many of which deal only with commonplace matters, along with the details of their authorship. No writer or jurist with a sense of responsibility would have had the courage to rely exclusively on his memory.

123. The milieu in which Indian scholars habitually lived must be considered in evaluating the hypothesis. Public disputations in which every scholar was on the alert to catch others in error must have infused a widespread and wholesome fear of inaccuracy in statement or citation.[1] In the Hindu scheme, which was in operation almost in its old rigour, up to the threshold of our times, the first and last stages (āśrama) in a Brāhmaṇa's life facilitated movement of men of learning from place to place. The wandering scholar was a common feature of Indian life, so long as movement was possible and not attended with risks. To assemble a large body of trained scholars for collecting material for a digest (nibandha) cannot have been difficult in such times.

124. The acute critical faculty and passion for meticulous accuracy, which the system developed, is reflected in the numerous instances, which every commentary or digest presents, of the preservation of even minute differences of reading in texts, which might be cited as authorities, and of their discussion by authors who explain how particular readings were accepted or rejected by particular named scholars. Works of great sanctity like the Vedas had special devices to preserve their integrity. Others of cardinal rank were preserved in authentic recensions by repetitions in schools and by public recitations. A scholar was expected to know by heart certain books like the Bhagavadgītā or the authorities in the śāstras in which he claimed proficiency. That the Dharmasūtras, like the Gṛhyasūtras, were memorised, may be safely assumed. Among those at least who dealt with dharma exposition, the dharmādhikārins, who were to be found in important centres like Benares or Paithān or Kāncī, mastery of the text of Manu and Yājñavalkya, must have been common. But most scholars relied on manuscripts. The form of Indian manuscripts, and the custom of scholars making their own transcripts, familiarised them with the way in which citations might be correctly and conveniently made from manuscripts. Indian books were not bound but kept in loose leaves. The transcription of relevant passages on any topic of dharma from manuscripts was easy and convenient. This is how commentators and makers of digests of dharmaśāstra have continued to work to our day.

125. If these features are understood, it will be seen that a higher degree of accuracy is to be expected in quotations made from carefully written manuscripts than from mere memory. The practice tended to restrict the scope for, and the possibility of erroneous ascription of authorship of passages cited. The possibility of mistakes arising from careless copying or interlineal annotation, which subsequent copyists perpetuated, cannot be completely ruled out, but the probability is. The vital character of the issues involved might have given temptation to occasional and deliberate corruption of a text or even the manufacture of a text, but the chances were strongly against a spurious text long remaining unexposed.

126. Within the limits indicated, it may be properly assumed that when the same verses are assigned to more than one author there is a great probability of dual or multiple authorship. The extant smṛtis will be sensibly thinned if we remove passages, occurring in them, which are attributed to other smṛtis. A common content is inevitable. From the fundamental assumption of Dharmaśāstras flowed their unity of aim, concord and homogeneity of content, at least as ideals. The accepted views of life and the regulation of ordinary lives is expressed not only in formal works like smṛtis but in a mass of diffused opinion contained in popular dicta. The use of the facile anuṣṭubh metre often resulted in verbal identity in the expression through that medium of one and the same idea by different persons. When knowledge is transmitted orally, by teaching or by discussion, some phrases, maxims or verses become tags which every one uses. They are often paraphrased or versified. Common sūtras in two smṛtis (e.g. between Āpastamba and Baudhāyana or between Baudhāyana and Vaśiṣṭha) or the versified form of sentiments in Manusmṛti which are also found in prose in Viṣṇusmṛti or Baudhāyana, or the alternation in the expression of the identical idea in prose or verse between Vaśiṣṭha and Baudhāyana (Kane, p. 31), will explain these features. Even writers who are scrupulous in admitting their debt to others and who name the authority they follow or indicate him vaguely as 'eke', 'itaraḥ', or 'anye', will not feel bound in the above cases to admit borrowing. To absorb an identifiable passage or verse, which is distinctive of an author, or an idea equally distinctive and recognisable, and then conceal it by a change of wording or phraseology or form, have always been condemned in India, whether practised by writers on śāstras or by poets. Bāṇa's contempt for such devices expresses an accepted maxim of ethic in composition.

127. The probability that identity of expression of the same views in Smṛtis is due to the materials for the works containing such passages being drawn from an immense reservoir of 'the floating proverbial wisdom of the philosophical and legal schools which already existed in metrical form' was urged by Bühler (Laws of Manu, pp. xcff.) and is accepted as a working hypothesis by Jolly (Hindu Law and Custom, p. 32). But Mr. Kane recognises the idea in some cases, and rejects it with emphasis when he considers the inter-relations of the smṛtis of Viṣṇu and Manu (op. cit., p. 64). He admits that in such cases, the theory of borrowing is weak. Two alternatives which remain are to postulate a common source or assume a wholesale interpolation of the material of one smṛti into another. In many cases the theory of interpolation will fail, because when carried out wholesale it cannot escape detection and exposure. The assumption that a smṛti which has vanished is the common source is not easier to accept than the idea of the existence of a mass of floating tradition on dharma, consisting of hundreds of verses, the authorship of which was unknown, and on which writers on dharmaśāstra drew freely. The Mahābhārata, which claims to be a smṛti (I, 2, 83), is obviously so constructed. The theory of interpolation overlooks an important fact. Writers, who scrupulously discriminate between their personal views and those of the leader they follow, as Kauṭilya does from his teacher (acāryāḥ) or Bṛhaspati from Manu, and like Bṛhaspati acknowledge their obligations, cannot be presumed to plagiarise, and interpolation in their works is therefore not easy.

128. While on the subject of the presence of verses of Bṛhaspati in other works, the existence of a large number of such verses in the Śukranītisāra should not be overlooked. In the very first chapter of the Vyavahāra section of Bṛhaspati (infra) over two dozen verses are found which are also in the Śukranītisāra, and verses in other chapters and sections are also found in the latter reproduced verbatim or in slightly modified forms. The baffling character of Śukra's work makes it unhelpful in the determination of the date of Bṛhaspatismṛti. It contains many archaic expressions and un-Pāṇinian forms. There is also much really old matter in it, side by side with matter which cannot be regarded as at all ancient. The Bṛhaspati passages are all however such as might have passed into general use from a well-known smṛti. Śukranītisāra has little that confirms the citations in the digests of the views of its author, named as Uśanas. It has no section on inheritance, and yet Vijñāneśvara knew of a dictum of Uśanas that a son was not bound to pay a father's unpaid toll or fine (Mitākṣarā on Yājñavalkya, II, 47). Uśanas is said by Aparārka to have laid down that in trials of sāhasa (grave crimes of violence) women, old men, the deaf, the blind and those of nonage, who are among the classes who could not ordinarily give evidence, can be witnesses. The principle of exclusion was apparently in regard to pre-appointed witnesses, and not casual testimony. Uśanas was thus in line with Viṣṇu (VIII, 7), Nārada (I, 188-9) and Kātyāyana (v. 365) as well as Manu (VIII, 72) whose śloka is incorporated by Śukra (IV, v. 188). The famous instances of local usage, like the marriage of a maternal uncle's daughter in the south, etc., which are given among smṛtis only by Bṛhaspati (Vyavahāra, I, 126–130) appear in Śukranītisāra (IV, v, 46–49).

129. This reproduction is useful in disposing of a suggestion of Jolly that certain verses, which followed the citation of the above verses in the Smṛticandrikā (Samskāra, p. 26), which are explicitly treated as anonymous by Devaṇṇa Bhaṭṭa ('kvacit kvacit dṛśyanta'), and which allude to noxious customs like incestuous unions (the union of brother with sister, bhrātṛvivāha, or the mother, mātṛvivāha, the reading favoured by Jolly) among the Pārasīkas, were Bṛhaspati's.[1] They do not appear in Śukra's work and have to be excluded from a collection of Bṛhaspati's ślokas. So has another verse, which is ascribed to Bṛhaspati on the authority of Bühler's edition of Haradatta's commentary (Ujjvalā) on the Dharmasūtra of Āpastamba, and which refers to the customs of the marriage of a widow to her husband's brother and fraternal polyandry (kule kanyāpradānam),[2] as it is not found in manuscripts of the Ujjvalā utilised in preparing his edition of it by Mahāmahopadhyāya Cinnasvāmi Śāstrī (his edn., p. 290, II, 27, 3).

The Evidence of the Dīnāra.

130. In dealing with the Unādisūtras, which are quoted by Pāṇini, Max Müller pointed out in 1860 (Ancient Sanskrit Literature, p. 245) that one of the words whose formation is dealt with in them is dīnāraḥ meaning a gold ornament. It is usually derived from dīna, poor, and ṛ, to go, and is said to mean 'what goes or is given to the poor'. The term is used also in the sense of seals or ornaments of gold. This etymology suggests the similar one given for nāṇaka, from nā, not, and aṇu, insignificant, and therefore a piece of money. The term nāṇaka is used in the sense of a coin by Yājñavalkya (II, 260-261), and the official coin-tester is called nāṇaka-parikṣī. Both terms have been used for the determination of the dates of the works in which they occur. Nāṇaka has been supposed to be the name of a coin, which bore the effigy of the goddess Nannaia. No goddess of that name is known in Indian mythology. The suggestion that it refers to a coin of the Kuṣans is purely conjectural, and is hardly less fanciful than the etymology cited.

131. The use of the word by Yājṇavalkya to describe minted coins generally, and the term nāṇaka-parikṣī as the designation of a shroff in a treasury, indicates that the word must have been long in use for minted coins. A coin introduced by a foreign dynasty could not have acquired the wide prevalence signified by the use of the name of one type of coin for coins generally.

132. The occurrence of the word dīnāra is however generally considered by European scholars as an indication of the works in which it occurs being later than the epoch of a wide circulation of coins derived from the Roman denarius, from which both the name and the coin known as dīnāra in India are said to be derived. The sūtra in the Unādisūtras in which it occurs was rejected by Max Müller as spurious and as a late interpolation, on the ground that Ujjvaladatta, a commentator on the work, noted as follows in his comment on the sūtra in which the name dīnāra is found: 'Dīnāra means a gold ornament, but this sūtra is not to be found in the Sūtravṛtti, and Devavṛtti (sūtramidam Sūtravṛttau Devavṛttau ca na dṛśyate)'.

133. If the aphorism in the Unādisūtras, which are anterior to Pāṇini, is authentic, in spite of the statement of Ujjvaladatta that he did not find it in two commentaries, it will imply that the word dīnāra was in use in India long before the introduction of denarii in Rome, in B.C. 269-268 (Hill, G. F., Historical Roman Coins, 1909). It was equated with ten bronze asses, and the name is said to be derived from this circumstance. The etymology does not appear more plausible than the Indian derivations of nāṇaka and dīnāra. It was a silver coin. Its original weight was about 92 grains. Between B.C. 217 and Nero, its weight was reduced to about 60 grains, and after Nero to 52·5 grains. Its value sank steadily till at the beginning of the 3rd century A.D. it was only worth three pence.

134. In 292 A.D. Diocletian introduced a full-value silver coin, with the Neronian weight of 60 grains. The new coin was called popularly argenteius, and the name denarius was transferred to a small copper coin. The argenteius, which was of pure silver, maintained its ground till 360 A.D. when it made way for a new scheme of silver coinage based on the golden solidus, the name by which the golden aureus, first introduced by Caesar with a weight of one-fortieth of a Roman pound, and parity to 25 silver denarii, came to be known from 312 A.D. when Constantine fixed its weight as one-seventy-secondth part of the Roman pound. When we are told that in the sixth century A.D. Cosmas Indicopleustes found the denarius received wherever he went, it must be the copper coin of the name that he must have meant.

135. The Indian use of dīnāra may be considered in relation to the Roman concept of denarius, which starting as a silver coin ended as a copper coin. The original copper coins of Rome were for internal circulation only. But with the establishment of the Roman empire and the extension of its trade influence, the wider overseas circulation of even its copper issues is intelligible. In India the dīnāra (as also probably the nāṇaka) stood for a gold coin. In the Jaina Kalpasūtra (Trn. H. Jacobi, S.B.E., XXII, p. 233) a lady's necklace is described as consisting of grains (of gold) and golden dīnāras strung together. In the Nāradasmṛti (in a rule concerning the forgery of precious objects) 'dīnāras and other objects made of gold' are referred to (Vyavahārapāda, II, v. 34: Maṇayaḥ padmarāgādyā dīnārādi hiraṇmayam). In the indication of standards of value for use in punishments (p. 229, v. 60) Nārada equates the dīnāra with suvarṇa, which seems to be another designation for it, probably a descriptive name. A golden dīnāra or suvarṇa is stated by him as equal to twelve dhānakāḥ. Four dīnāras make a niṣka, a gold coin of higher value. Four silver kārṣapaṇas (known in the Dakhan as raupya, i.e., made of silver, ib., v. 57) make a dhānaka. In the Punjab, the silver kārṣapaṇa had another name, aṇḍikā. The silver kārṣapaṇa was equal to twenty copper paṇas or māṣas, and one māṣa or copper paṇa was equal to four kākaṇīs, apparently the lowest unit of currency. Bṛhaspati (p. 89, infra) seems to follow the same scale, but he gives the name cāndrikā to the kārṣapaṇa and describes it as of copper. Possibly, there may have been coins of this designation and value in relation to the dhānakas (which must have been of silver only) in both copper and silver, of course of different weights. The tables of weights and coins in different books vary, but for the present purpose the important fact is that the dīnāra was always a gold coin in India, while in the Roman republic and empire the denarius, from which it is held to be derived, was first of silver and ultimately of copper, and never of gold. The data given in Manusmṛti, VIII, 132–134, and Yājñavalkyasmṛti (I, 362-363) indicate that a suvarṇa (i.e., golden dīnāra) was equal in weight to 16 māṣās or eighty ratis or kṛṣṇalas, i.e. 160 grains, taking a kṛṣṇala to weigh two grains.[1] In the early empire, the weight of

[1] Rapson (Indian Coins, para. 91) states that the Kuṣans borrowed the Roman aurei standard of 124 grains, but this gave way to another standard based on the ancient Indian weights, which gave a suvarṇa (dīnāra) of 80 ratis weight, or 146·4 grains, taking the rati as equal to 1·83 grains. As the copper paṇa was of the same weight the silver denarius was one-half that of the golden aureus, which weighed nearly 123 grains. The ratio between gold and silver was 1: 12½. In the Persian empire in the fifth century B.C. the ratio was 1: 13⅓. Mattingley gives the ratio between silver and copper in Rome as 1: 45 (Roman Coins, 1928, p. 123). During the first century of the Christian era, when there was a heavy drain of gold from Rome to pay for imports, which roused the ire of Pliny,[1] this was the ratio.

136. The known facts of the history of Roman coinage do not thus fit in with the theory that the Indian gold dīnāra is the same as the denarius.

137. A philological difficulty was encountered in explaining the equation. The e (eta) for ī (iota) in the transformation of the Latin name into the Sanskrit dīnāra had to be explained. Jolly (Hindu Law and Custom, trn., p. 48) cited the authority of G. Meyer and Brugmann for the view that 'as the Denar might have reached India only through the Greeks, and as the pronunciation of eta as iota begins generally in the days of the empire about the second century A.D. (dinaria for denaria in an inscription of 161–169 A.D.), so the Dīnāras in India struck in imitation of the Denars could hardly have come into existence before the second century A.D., although coins of the weight of a Denar were issued by the Indo-Scythian kings'. These views are no longer tenable. The finding of hoards of coins belonging to much earlier periods of Roman history in South India, in the Māṇikyāla stūpa and in Hazāra would show that the Indo-Roman trade should be put back even before the conquest of Alexandria by Caesar in B.C. 47. Coins of the first four emperors have been found in South India. It has been estimated by Mommsen that at least half-a-million sterling worth of gold in specie went to India in the first half of the first century A.D.

138. It was pointed out by Dr. A. B. Keith as long ago as 1915 (J.R.A.S., 1915, pp. 504-505) that A. Thum, who revised Brugmann's work has showed that that 'i and e were often interchanged in the Hellenistic Greek of Asia Minor and Egypt, and that in the Hellenistic period e approximated more and more to the small i vowel as the

as the suvarṇa, viz. 80 ratis, and 960 paṇas were equal to a suvarṇa in value, the ratio between gold and copper in India must have been 1 : 960.

[1] Pliny deplored (Natural History, XII, 18) the drain of specie to the East. The Indians cared nothing for the wines and oil and leather and woollen goods of Europe, and the imports into Rome had to be paid by specie. Pliny estimated the drain at 800,000 sterling (Gibbon's Decline and Fall, ed. Bury, I, 55).

interchange with ei and i on papyri, after the middle of the second century B.C.'. In Thum's view, as cited by Keith, the complete identification of the two sounds belongs to the conclusion of the ancient period of Greece. Dr. Keith concludes that therefore the transformation of denarius into dīnāra need not be later than the beginning of the Christian era.

139. The findings in respect to denarius do not get over the fundamental difficulty in accounting for the application of the name of a foreign silver coin to a gold coin so largely current as to be treated by legal writers as an ordinary coin of account for jural and administrative purposes, and to be capable of the familiar form of hoarding as jewellery. Nor is it explained why samples of a gold coinage so widely in circulation, as to supersede older types, have not come to light, while older issues have. It is absurd to think that the name of a coin in an inferior metal should have been given to a gold coin, and that its weight should have been copied in the new gold coin for no ostensible reason. In the light of the evidence which has been considered from other standpoints for the dates of Bṛhaspati and Nārada, more difficulty will be encountered in fitting the evidence from the denarius as the original of the dīnāra even with the history of the Indo-European trade which had reached its widest extension before the Flavian Caesars. It is surprising that after the argenteius and the aureius of gold had come into use, and the Caesars had centralised the coinage in the precious metals and made it an imperial monopoly, the balance of trade which should have been met by the exportation of the aureii should not have popularised its name in India instead of the debased denarius. It cannot be seriously contended that when later the only denarius that might find its way into India would be the copper coin of the name the incongruity would not have struck Indian writers and traders. The use of the word dīnāra in inscriptions from about 400 A.D. to describe gold coins must have synchronised with the very period in which it was superseded in the Roman empire.

Evidence of Astronomical Terms.

140. The significance to be attached to the astronomical or rather astrological knowledge displayed in a number of verses in the samskārakāṇḍa, infra, have already been discussed. It will be observed on a perusal of these ślokas, that they only refer to matters like the sixteen samskāras from garbhādāna onwards which figure in not only Manusmṛti but in the Gṛhya and Dharmasūtras. In regard to the naming ceremony of the child (nāmakaraṇa) Manu says 'let the father perform or cause to be performed the Nāmadheya (rite of naming the child) on the tenth or twelfth day after birth, or on a lucky lunar day, in a lucky muhūrta, under an auspicious constellation' (II, 30). This rule is found in the Gṛhyasūtras of Āśvalāyana (I, 15, 4–10), Sānkhāyana (I, 24, 4-5), Pāraskara (I, 17, 1) and Gobhila (II, 8, 8) as well as the smṛtis of Viṣṇu (XXVII, 5–9) and Yājñavalkya (I, 12). But, the advice to fix on an astrologically lucky day is only found in Manu's. It is natural that Bṛhaspati should, like a good vārtikakāra, fill in the details broadly indicated by Manu (infra, Samskāra, vv. 58–72) and that he should explain the importance of the name-giving ceremony (v. 72) by showing that 'for every one the name is needed in affairs of the world, that it brings one luck in auspicious ceremonies, that it is to the name that the fame a man obtains attaches, and that therefore the name-ceremony is praiseworthy'. The verses attributed to Bṛhaspati in the Vīramitrodaya, the Prayogapārijāta and other works, which contain such astrological indications, are strictly relevant to the smṛti. They are ascribed not to a work on astrology by Bṛhaspati (which also is rarely quoted as Jyotir-Bṛhaspati) but to Bṛhaspati simply, implying that in their belief it was part of his smṛti. Works on astrology pass in the names of sages, who are also regarded as authors of smṛtis. We have the names of eighteen and twenty such sages in lists attributed to Kāśyapasamhitā and Parāśarasamhita.[1] But the name of Bṛhaspati is not found in these lists, unless Ācāryāḥ in the enumeration of Parāśarasamhitā refers to him. Mahāmahopadhyāya Sudhākara Dvivedī (Gaṇitataraṅgiṇī, p. 2) would apparently treat the word ācāryaḥ as an attribute of Pauliśa, as he considers that only nineteen names are mentioned in the list of Parāśara, whereas it will make twenty, if ācāryaḥ is counted, as it seems reasonable that he should, as a separate writer. It is evident that Jyotir-Bṛhaspati is not as early work as his smṛti, even on the evidence of fragments of it which are cited in digests. That even Kauṭilya was credited with a work on astrology,[2] in spite of his relegation of the court astrologer to a minor position in the official hierarchy, and his reproof of the king who is unable to take a decision without constant questioning

[1] The lists of astronomers are reproduced in MM. Sudhākara Dvivedi's Gaṇakataraṅgiṇī (1833), p. 1. They name among the astronomers many famous as dharma-pravartakas, e.g. Pitāmaha, Vyāsa, Vasiṣṭha, Atri, Parāśara, Kaśyapa, Nārada, Garga, Marīci, Manu, Angiras, Lomaśa, Cyavana, Bhṛgu, Śaunaka, and Ācāryāh. Bṛhaspati's name is missing in this comprehensive enumeration.

[2] Bhaṭṭotpala, the commentator on Varāhamihira's Bṛhatsamhitā, quotes a śloka, which ascribes a work on calculation of longevity to Viṣṇugupta, i.e. Kauṭilya. The Mudrārākṣasa illustrates the belief in Kauṭilya's proficiency in astrology.

of the astrologer, is seen from Utpala's allusion to a work on the determination of longevity by him (as Viṣṇugupta). The Mudrārākṣasa of Viśākhadatta also makes Kauṭilya expert in astrology, and it doubtless gives expression to an old tradition.

141. The implication of the large number of ślokas which have come down as Bṛhaspati's, and which show knowledge of planetary astrology and the use of names, some of which are Greek unmistakably, will be that Bṛhaspatismṛti probably underwent a revision in the fifth or the sixth century A.D., when this astrological matter was added to the smṛti in elaboration of similar matter, already in it, developing Manu's injunctions to select proper muhūrtas for the samskāras. The hypothesis will not affect the validity of conclusions regarding the date of the smṛti of Bṛhaspati itself, which seem to be indicated by other evidence.

The Evidence of the Mṛcchakaṭī.

142. The trial scene in Mṛcchakaṭī is usually alluded to as reflecting the procedure laid down in the smṛtis of Nārada and Bṛhaspati, and thereby furnishing some evidence of their dates. The argument has not much value. The procedure must have been settled long before the smṛtis which describe it. The smṛti could not have made law and a departure in procedure.

143. Dr. Jayaswal's view that Nārada is later than the play, as only the term nāṇaka is mentioned for 'money', and not dīnāra, which both Nārada and Bṛhaspati use is untenable. Nāṇaka was clearly not a foreign name but an Indian name for a coin or money. Dīnāra was a golden coin. Apart from these considerations, the date of the Mṛcchakaṭī is now placed about the fifth century A.D., while the drift of evidence in regard to the date of the two smṛtis is that they are earlier. An unlucky astrological combination consisting in a weak Jupiter, a strong and adverse Mars, and Ketu, is mentioned in Mṛcchakaṭī (IX, 33).[1] The play mentions Cāṇakya and quotes (IX, 39) an opinion of Manusmṛti by name (VIII, 380).

Metres in Bṛhaspatismṛti.

144. The smṛti was, to judge from the fragments, not only in the ordinary anuṣṭubh metre, like Manusmṛti or Yājñavalkya's code, but employed other metres also. This is not against custom. Āpastamba-Dharmasūtra has a verse in upajāti (II, 7, 17, 18). Baudhāyana has verses in vamśasthā and upajāti (IV, 3, 14; II, 3, 18).

Vasiṣṭhasmṛti has verses in upajāti, indravajrā and upendravajrā. The Kauṭilya-Arthaśāstra uses upajāti and indravajrā and so does Viṣṇusmṛti. Out of twenty verses in all, which appear as Bṛhaspati's in this collection, two are irregular and defective, and possibly were meant as āryā, five are in upajāti, five in indravajrā, one in āryā, two in mālinī, two in śikhariṇī, one in śālinī, and one each in śragdharā and śārdūlavikrīditā. On purely metrical grounds these verses cannot be regarded as incompatible with their appearance in a work one or two centuries before or after the Christian era. Judged by subject as well as metre, the non-śloka verses in the vyavahāra section, the upajāti verse on the importance of the name on p. 242, the indication of seasons and tithis for performing the upanayana (p. 255), the praise of the gifts of gold, land, and cows (p. 274) and the purity innate of certain things (p. 321) appear authentic.

145. A large number of half-verses appear in this collection. As they are taken from citations, this feature may be due to quotations not taking up more than one half of śloka. But the presence of half-verses is not unusual in smṛtis (Āpastamba-Dharmasūtra, II, 5, 11, 5-6 and II, 9.21, 10). Certain half-verses are found tacked on to different halves, conveying a different meaning. Such cases have to be treated as independent verses.

Some features of Bṛhaspatismṛti.

146. The work of Bṛhaspati was obviously designed as a samhitā like Manusmṛti. It is equally clear that it aimed at supplementing Manusmṛti, though the text of it, which it dealt with, seems to have been different from the extant recension of that famous code. Its general outlook is that of its model. It never goes against the explicit rules of Manu, and when it makes a departure (as in the case of the contention that some articles treated as impartible by Manu must be subjects of division sui generis, and in the reconciliation of the apparently conflicting views of Manu on niyoga) it does so by stressing the spirit in preference to the letter of the rule. Its admiration for Manusmṛti is expressed in a dictum that the sciences, logic and grammar shine only where Manu the teacher of dharma, artha and mokṣa is 'not seen' (p. 233, v. 12). He has a high notion of the smṛti and of his vocation as a jurist. In two contexts (pp. 233 and 264) he compares śruti and smṛti to the two eyes, whose co-ordination is necessary for proper vision, and compares him who relies on only one of these to an one-eyed person, while he who ignores both is simply blind. It is an assertion of the hypothesis of the Vedic basis of law and usage as well as of the condemnation of a pure vaidika attitude of contempt for smṛti as human. He has a dig (which has become proverbial) at the mere Vedic chanter, who does not know the meaning and significance of the mantras in a verse.

147. A knowledge of the purāṇas and the itihāsas is essential to a Brāhmaṇa, who should not be content merely to know the Veda, for it is through them that the splendour of the Veda is to be grasped, and 'the Veda fears the man of little learning as one who would ruin it' (p. 232, v. 10). Mere birth cannot give honour to a Brāhmaṇa. Disrespect is not shown to a Brāhmaṇa, if he is a fool and ignorant of the Vedas, and is therefore slighted. To show such a man honour is 'like throwing the offerings in a sacrifice on the ashes, neglecting the flaming fire' (p. 270, v. 275). But mere learning without character and purity of conduct (ācāra) avails little to a Brāhmaṇa. 'He who neglects the Vedas and their adjuncts as well as the rites laid down by the Vedas, and is ignorant of the smṛti is immersed in impenetrable darkness like a moonless night' (p. 263, v. 227). 'He who fails to perform the rites which are enjoined by the Veda will be re-born in the womb of a caṇḍālā or a bitch' (p. 296, v. 476).

148. The belief in the gradual degradation of human nature and strength from cycle of time (yuga) to cycle is reflected in Bṛhaspati (p. 232). It is used to reconcile the apparent contradiction in the attitude of Manu towards the levirate (niyoga). The old belief that there is no heaven for the sonless is reaffirmed (p. 240, vv. 58–60). But a good and chaste wife, even if she be sonless attains heaven (p. 194, v. 15). In spite of epic precedent, polyandry is held up to reprobation (p. 286, v. 403), and even the fraternal variety of it. Bṛhaspati is strongly opposed like Manu to varṇasamkara (mixture of castes). The person 'born a Brāhmaṇa should avoid miscegenation. Human birth is the best of all, and in it birth as a Brāhmaṇa' (p. 372, v. 51). Impurity equal to miscegenation results in nine ways: by using the same bed as one of lower varṇa, the same seat, sitting together, using the same vessels, sharing the same meals and mixing their food, performing sacrifices for one of the lower varṇas for whom they are interdicted, teaching such persons the Vedas, and having sex relations with persons of such varṇas (p. 376, vv. 24-25). Eating the food of the Śūdra implies degradation, and the best of all persons for presiding at a śrāddha is one in whose belly there is no Śūdra food (p. 332, v. 43). A penance is laid down for the snapping of a Brahmaṇa's sacred thread by a Śūdra (p. 381, v. 60). The functional divisions between the varṇas are recited almost as in the old dharmasūtras (p. 300, v. 500; p. 304, v. 528; p. 304, vv. 529-530). The only advance on older rules is that besides service to the three higher varṇas, the Śūdra is assigned the right to practise all crafts (sarva-śilpa) and to trade in all articles (vikrayaḥ sara- paṇyāṇām). Trade, industry, and the crafts seem to have been divided between the last two varṇas by the time. In times of distress the Brāhmaṇa might follow the occupation of the Kṣatriya and the Vaiśya, but he must avoid undertaking the Śūdra's (vārṣalam parivarjayet, p. 365, v. 2). 'The Brāhmaṇa who weds a Śūdra woman, or lives for a year in a Śūdra village or shares the water of the same well with a Śūdra becomes in a year a Śūdra' (p. 371, v. 47).

149. The delimitation of certain areas as those which are pre-eminently fit for Brāhmaṇa occupation, which the older dharmasūtras and some of the smṛtis indicate is not found in any text of Bṛhaspati.[1] Manusmṛti (II, 22-23) describes Āryāvarta as lying between the Himālayas and the Vindhyas, and between the eastern and western oceans. Viṣṇusmṛti implies that wherever the smṛti rules of varṇāśrama are in force is Āryāvarta (lxxxiv, 4). Bṛhaspati does not rule out habitation south of the Vindhyas and prescribes different times, on astronomical grounds, for the performance of some rites north and south of the Vindhyas (p. 262, v. 219).

150. The exaltation of the king and the Brāhmaṇa, which are features of Manusmṛti, reappears in Bṛhaspati. Manu (IX, 245) declares that 'the Brāhmaṇa who has mastered the Vedas is the lord of the universe'. He also states that 'by birth the Brāhmaṇa attains primacy on earth, and he is the lord of all living things, for the protection of the treasure of Dharma' (I, 99). The king had been described by Manu as a divine being who incarnates as a human being (VII, 8). His apparently arbitrary power is also described by Manu (VII, 9–13). But the king is not competent to sentence a Brāhmaṇa to death, to confiscate to the State his properties, or to levy taxes from him (VIII, 380; IX, 188-189; VII, 133). The explicit exemption of the Brāhmaṇa from the tax of one-sixth on land is in a rule of Vasiṣṭha (I, 42–44) who explained the exemption on the authority of an alleged passage of the Veda that 'the king obtains a sixth part of the merit which the Brāhmaṇas gain by sacrifices and charitable works'![2] The rules are made clear by Bṛhaspati (p. 368, vv. 18–20). 'The Brāhmaṇa and the King are the two who have taken the vow of protecting Dharma, and between their duties there is no difference. The Brāhmaṇa cultivating his land holds his land freely of his own will, as he is its sole lord; he need not give anything to any one. Therefore the Brāhmaṇa cultivating his land justly need not give any land tax either to the head of the village or the king.' '(The king) should not cast his mind in longing on the property of the Brāhmaṇa (brahma-svam) even when he is at his last gasp, for while what has been burnt out by fire might grow again, what is burnt by the Brāhmaṇa's anger (brahma-dagdham) never sprouts again.' 'Poison is not poison, it is the wealth of the Brāhmaṇa (when appropriated) which is poison; ordinary poison kills only one person, the (appropriated) wealth of the Brāhmaṇa destroys children and grandchildren also. If a Brāhmaṇa's wealth is peacefully enjoyed (by another) it burns up his family to the seventh generation; and if it is enjoyed by force, it destroys a family for ten steps above and ten generations after the forcible possessor' (p. 371, vv. 42–44).

151. The claims of the Brāhmaṇa for civil and penal immunity are thus stated by Bṛhaspati in the same terms as Manu, and with equal emphasis. Though even a Brāhmaṇa who comes with murderous intent may be slain in self-defence, his judicial execution is not even to be thought of (p. 302, v. 513). A person obtains the fruits of existence by merely helping a Brāhmaṇa (p. 304, v. 531). Consideration to the Brāhmaṇa is shown in other ways also. The elaboration of the doctrine of salvation by gifts is a special feature of Bṛhaspati among writers on Dharmaśāstra. The memory of his teaching on dāna (gifts) is enshrined in the dialogues on dāna between him and Indra that we find in the epic and purāṇas. The donation of lands to learned Brāhmaṇas and settling them in villages (agrahāra), which Kālidāsa describes (Raghuvaṁśa, I, 44),[1] and which became a favourite type of benefaction with kings, may have been stimulated by the development of Bṛhaspati's teachings on dāna, and especially by his exaltation of the gifts of land, kine and gold. Bṛhaspati, lawyer-like, insists on such gifts being perpetual and heritable; and they are to be free from sequestration, and of all claims by the State (p. 301, v. 508). The grants should be duly recorded on copper plates and contain full particulars of the dates of the gift (ib., v. 510) and be attested by the grantor's name and signature. Fearful imprecations against those who, in future, set aside the gifts or interfere with them, along with blessings on those who respect such donations, whether their own or of others, are set forth by Bṛhaspati (pp. 370-371, vv. 38–47) and they form essential parts of the recital in all such grants in later times. As the formation of villages of śrotriyas and gifts of land to learned Brāhmaṇas virtually constitute an endowment of learning, religion and free education, the benefits which future generations derived from such endowments must be laid to Bṛhaspati's credit.

152. The re-enunciation of the old rule that the king contracts no impurity (aśauca) is a logical corollary of the exaltation of royal power (p. 353, v. 7). An exemption is given to royal servants, as well as actors and mimics, from the rules forbidding shaving and manicuring on certain occasions (p. 253, v. 154).

153. Manu's distinction between ācārya, upādhyāya, and guru (see ante, para. 107) is simplified by Bṛhaspati (p. 263, v. 222). The father and preceptor are mixed up, as the ācārya is defined as he who performs the ceremony or initiation and also teaches the Veda.

154. Meat is allowed in śrāddha and in sacrifices like the sautrāmaṇi, as well as for sickness, along with wine, but he who does not consume them is praised (p. 322, vv. 83–85; p. 351, v. 153). Ordinarily, the touch of fermented liquor necessitates expiation (p. 383, v. 76).

155. Like Yājñavalkya and Nārada, Bṛhaspati shows some physiological knowledge and belief. The specification of twelve days before menstruation as the period when a woman is free of its effects and is qualified for partnership with her husband in religious rites, is a recognition of periods of feminine fertility and barrenness (p. 234, v. 20; p. 236, v. 30). Bṛhaspati shares the curious belief that the determination of the sex of the unborn child is due to the relative strength of the contribution of the parents (p. 236, vv. 33-34). The premature growth of teeth of infants is believed to presage the death of the father (p. 240, v. 60).

156. The clear enunciation of the rule of primogeniture by Bṛhaspati in regard to succession to the throne must be noted (p. 303, v. 516). 'Even though a good younger brother is available (preferable for his qualities) the eldest brother alone merits succession to a kingdom, precedence in marriage and selection for performing the ceremony of sapiṇḍīkaraṇa for a dead father.' Manu had laid down that the first born son being the son who freed the parents from their debt must be deemed the offspring begotten of the law, the others being only the offspring of desire (IX, v. 107).[1] He allowed the eldest son, as an option, to take the whole estate of the father (ib., v. 105), and his commentators have been at pains to explain away the rule, for which there is precedent in Gautama (XXVIII, 3)[2] and Baudhāyana (II, 3, 13),[1] by suggesting that it would apply only to cases in which the eldest son was gifted and the younger sons were undistinguished. Manu had also declared roundly that 'the elder brother who marries after the younger, the younger brother who marries before the elder, the female with whom the marriage is contracted, he who gives her away, and the sacrificing priest, as the fifth, all fall into hell' (III, 172). Bṛhaspati's categorical enunciation of primogeniture, even if the younger son was abler and better fitted than the eldest, would have been treason in the early Gupta empire when it was set at nought by Samudragupta as well as by his son Chandragupta II, who also married his brother's wife. The selection of the younger son is justified in the Allahabad and Bhitāri stone-pillar inscriptions (J. F. Fleet, C.I.I., III, pp. 12 and 54).[2] It is inconceivable that the dictum could have been publicly laid down after the middle of the fourth century A.D.

157. We see in Bṛhaspati's injunctions both the idealist and the realist. The latter is much in evidence in the section on āpad-dharma (occupations of distress). The rule in sāhasa (p. 183, v. 4) declaring that the law that the assassin of the higher varṇas can be summarily killed in righteous combat is held to be inapplicable in kaliyuga tends to idealise the sanctity of the Brāhmaṇa by mere birth. The exception is in conflict with the clear injunctions to destroy the would-be-assassin (pp. 185-186, vv. 17–19), even if he was a master of the Veda and of unimpeachable orthodoxy, and proclaiming such destruction of a dangerous criminal as not only not sinful but as equal to the merit resulting from an aśvamedha (horse sacrifice). Manu (VIII, 350-351) has an injunction in identical terms.[3]

[2] In the Allahabad inscription (Fleet, Gupta Inscriptions, 1889), Samudragupta states that he was selected by his father to succeed him, which would be unnecessary if he was the eldest son. He had an elder brother named Kāca. He also speaks with pride of his being the son of the Licchavi queen, Kumāradevī. Candragupta II was a younger son of Samudragupta, who overthrew his elder brother Rāmagupta and probably had him killed, and then married his sister-in-law, the Queen Dhruvadevī (see A. S. Altekar, 'A New Gupta King', J.B.O.R.S., 1928, pp. 223–253).

158. On the other hand, there are equally clear rules against killing the Brāhmaṇa, even as a judicial punishment for the gravest crimes (p. 302, v. 513). In the list of inexpiable offences (mahāpātaka) the slaying of a Brāhmaṇa leads (p. 32, v. 23). To emphasise to the utmost degree the gravity of an offence it is enough to treat it as equal to the slaying of a Brāhmaṇa (p. 55, v. 34, where the corrupt assessor and the false witness are described so: 'brahmahā ca samāḥ smṛtāḥ'). The destruction of the means of subsistence (vṛttihāni) is said to be in one sense as grave as the killing of a Brāhmaṇa, but in its effect not altogether the same, since 'at the end of a kalpa, the slayer of a Brāhmaṇa may be cleared of the sin, but never the destroyer of one's livelihood' (p. 371, v. 45). In three verses (p. 381, vv. 61–63) Bṛhaspati pictures the enormity of the crime of those who slay those who kill persons defending parents, preceptors, oneself, property, kine, land and houses, women, relations, friends, wives and benefactors, by declaring it as 'Brāhmaṇa-killing' (brahma-ghāta).

159. The apparent inconsistency is thus not only between the two rules about killing the assassin, even if he is a learned Brāhmaṇa, but in reconciling both with the general inhibition against taking away a Brāhmaṇa's life. The conflict occurs in this matter in other smṛtis also. It is not therefore possible to reject one of the dicta as spurious, or to assume that the jurist (like Bṛhaspati) who enunciated the rules is inconsistent through inadvertence. This is why commentators have been put to the necessity of explaining away the apparent inconsistency. The different interpretations on which the reconciliation is effected, so as to save the general rule of Brāhmaṇa immunity, are summarised by me elsewhere (Rājadharma, 1940, pp. 83 and 206-207). It is sufficient to note that Bṛhaspati has himself furnished one way of reconciliation by ruling that the rule to kill the manifest assassin, so far as the Brāhmaṇa is concerned, is not for this yuga.

160. Another instance of the conflict apparently proceeding from the existence of a general practice, which cannot be overthrown by mere fiat of a smṛti, and old rules against the practice is furnished by Bṛhaspati's statements on money-lending or usury, for which the technical term is kusīda, while the term for the usurer is vārddhuṣika. Bṛhaspati uses the term vārddhuṣya in more than one sense. He who takes as interest more than the principal or who extorts compound interest (cakravṛddi) is a vārddhuṣika (p. 102, v. 21). He who having bought things at normal prices, sells them for exhorbitant prices (mahargham), i.e. a profiteer, is a varddhuṣika. The second sense of the term seems an innovation, by extension, by Bṛhaspati. The importance of money-lending in society is indicated by including inability for it to flourish as one of the features of anarchy (p. 2, v. 8). Kusīda-paripālanam, protection of capital, is one of the functions of the State. It is one of the seven recognised means of amassing wealth (p. 70, v. 4). The appointment by a capitalist of the agent, who acquires thereby legal obligations as a nisṛṣṭārthaḥ, is legally recognised (p. 98, v. 29; p. 118, v. 122). Money-lending is allowed as a distress occupation to a Brāhmaṇa (p. 365, v. 3) but the further injunction that he is permitted to follow the profession by himself (svayam kṛtam) may reflect the desire of Bṛhaspati to prevent a Brāhmaṇa from engaging in large-scale money-lending, by employing agents.

161. But the ancient prejudice against the usurer persists. The food given by an usurer is classed with that of an outcaste and the Brāhmaṇa, who partakes such food, must live on barley (yava) alone for twelve days as a penance (p. 374, v. 7). This is a re-affirmation of the prohibition of Manu (IV, 210, 220),[1] his further statement that, as between a liberal usurer and a miserly śrotriya there is parity (ib., IV, 224)[2] and 'the usurer's food may become purified by faith while the other man's is defiled by want of it' being only a rhetorical outburst against the miser, even if he be a śrotriya. He excludes an usurer (vārdhuṣika) from a śrāddha (III, 153, 180). So does Bṛhaspati (p. 374, v. 15). Bṛhaspati's contempt for a money-lender as one who takes advantage of the difficulties of a necessitous person to his own benefit is shown by an ingenious etymology he gives of the word kusīda (interest on money lent). 'What is taken fourfold or eightfold (the regular rate) without any qualm from a person in distress (sīdataḥ) is called kusīda (p. 100, v. 6).' The recommendation of Bṛhaspati that the Brāhmaṇa, who takes to trade, agriculture or money-lending, should wash out the sin of doing so, by feeding Brāhmaṇas, the gods and the pitṛs (p. 365, v. 4 and v. 6) out of the gains of money-lending, is a manifest application and extension of the rule stated in Manusmṛti (IV, 210, 220). It indicates how the old ethic was reconciled with the ethic of capitalistic economy.

162. Bṛhaspati, who has already been seen to stress the influence of propinquity and association in bringing about a lowering of character in Brāhmaṇas, has certain dicta excluding from participation in ancestral rites (pitrye) a number of named professions by following which Brāhmaṇas become degraded (p. 374, v. 15). Of these avocations, some are morally vile (e.g. pimp, bully, thief and poisoner) and others are inoffensive except for their associations, like leather selling, weaving, practice of medicine, soothsaying, washing clothes, etc. The list may be well compared with the longer catalogue given by Manu (III, 150–167).

163. A nation's level is judged by its treatment of its women and the place it assigns them in its religious, social and public activities. Judged by this test, the India of the Vedas, the epics and smṛtis will not show to disadvantage. Manu's exhortations for considerate treatment of women is worthy of his eminent position among authorities on conduct. Bṛhaspati goes one better than Manu. Manu was silent on the right of the widow to succeed to her husband's estate; Bṛhaspati made her the first heir of the sonless man, and justified his decision in words of passionate eloquence, which still ring through the corridors of time, as one of the best statements of the wife's case (pp. 211–213). His advocacy of the rights of the daughter are no less rational and eloquent (pp. 217-218). It is characteristic of Bṛhaspati's powers of persuasion that in advocating both these claims, against the strongly entrenched opponents of the claims, he rests his case not only on reason and precedent but on the paramount authority of the Vedas, citing even the śruti passage, as for example, the famous address to the daughter, 'angād-angāt sambhavasi', which is found in the Śatapatha-brāhmaṇa (14, 9, 4, 8), the Bṛhadarāṇyaka Upaniṣad (6, 4, 8), and most of the Gṛhyasūtras as well as the Mahābhārata (Ādiparva, lxxiv, 63).

164. It is in keeping with his attitude to woman that Bṛhaspati makes a skilful application of certain old sayings for the purpose of providing a means of rehabilitating outraged or fallen women, who were likely to be driven out of society. He reaffirms the old doctrine of the physical purity of women (striyaḥ pavitram atulam, p. 362, v. 66), and ancient sayings that women derived their cleanliness and sweet speech from the gods (p. 362, v. 65), and that they remain uncontaminated in spite of their being supposed to have been enjoyed by gods (p. 361, v. 62), to declare with emotion that in no circumstances can women be cast away—when they are forced, or outraged by robbers, or if they fall through their own weakness (svayam vipratipannā tu). Women, independently of their status, were protected from seduction, abduction and outrage by stringent provisions of the law against the offender. The Kauṭilīya provided a punishment for the man who defiled the daughter of his own slave (infra, p. 230).[1] Yājñavalkya will not exempt even a Brāhmaṇa from punishment if he seduces a slave woman (II, 290).[1] Nārada classes the seduction of a wet-nurse (dhātrī) as an inexpiable offence and rules that the offender should be mutilated (XV, vv. 73–75).[2] The abduction of a virgin was a capital offence according to the Nārada-pariśiṣṭa (28).[3] Bṛhaspati held the abduction of a married woman to be a capital offence.

165. While the law might have had a deterrent effect on sex offences, the injured woman still suffered more than the man, and in any case was treated as virtually outside the family. Even Bṛhaspati repeats (as part of the civil law) the rule that the ravished woman should be kept apart, with just enough food and clothing, within the house and made to undergo penance, unless she was outraged by one of a lower caste, when she could be put away (p. 191, vv. 18-19). This is the old law. But Vasiṣṭha had declared with more humanity that a wife who had eloped or been forced cannot be cast away (XXVIII, 2–4).[4] The rehabilitation of the outraged woman was provided for by Bṛhaspati in the above amendment to the old law, as was done later by Dēvala, after the Muslim invasions of Sindh. There might be more than mere humanity behind the alteration thus made. Can one read into the change and the impassioned justification of it by Bṛhaspati the practical need of a solution for a social problem of increasing gravity in an epoch of confusion, in which the law was unable to protect women as of old, and misery and the breaking up of homes would have been the consequence of failure to provide meliorative measures? If so, we have to look for the causative conditions in the epochs before the foundation of the Gupta empire, and after the fall of the Śunga empire, or in the short period of two generations represented by the invasions of Toramana and Mihiragula in the last quarter of the fifth and the first quarter of the sixth century A.D. The second of the suggested periods is impossible. In the settled conditions of the Gupta empire to which Fa-hien bears testimony, such outrages against women could not have been at least numerous. We have to look for a period in which persons foreign to Indian culture and religion were in military occupation of the land, such as the commencement of the Christian era.

166. The bent of Bṛhaspati's mind is conservative, and the so-called 'advance' which marks his work was in no sense designed as a break with tradition, but was justified as truer to the spirit of Dharma than the views modified or discarded. His moral standards are pitched high. Truth raises man above human weakness; 'he who speaks truth is like unto a god' (p. 9, v. 54). Litigation and trials are spiritualised. In two places Bṛhaspati treats a judicial proceeding as a yajña (p. 9, v. 55; p. 20, vv. 118-119). 'In the yajña Viṣṇu is worshipped; in vyavahāra, the king is. The successful litigant is like the sacrificer, and the defeated party is the victim (paśu). The plaint and the reply are like the offering for the sacred fire, and the pratijñā is the havis (offering). The Vedas stand for law, and the assessors to the officiating priests.' Forestalling Kālidāsa (Raghuvamśa, IV, 12)[1] and amplifying the concept, Bṛhaspati derives the word Rājā from the roots meaning 'to please' and 'to shine', and describes the king as fitly named Rājā as he delights his subjects, and shines by the splendour of his person. Bṛhaspati works some of the qualities, which the judge should possess, into another etymology. It is the duty of the judge to reassure parties and prevent alarm or nervousness in them by his urbanity, and by putting them at ease by speaking first. The official designation of the judge is prāḍ-vivāka. The component terms of the word are described as suggesting that he puts the question to the parties in the trial, in initiating proceedings (prād), and discovers truth by questions and re-examination (vivāka). As described by Bṛhaspati, the trial opens with these words to the plaintiff (kāryārtin): 'What do you want done? What is your distress? Be not afraid, O man, but speak' (p. 24, v. 145). In a second śloka, Bṛhaspati derives the name from the Veda, where the words prād and vivāka are used (Atharva-Veda, II, 27, 1 and 7; Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa, III, 4, 6, 1) in the sense of 'debator' and 'clear up by speech'. Prād is derived from pṛcch, to question ('pṛcchati praśnam iti śrutiḥ', Bṛhaspati, p. 11). Haradatta in commenting on the sūtra of Gautama, 'the king, or the judge or the Brāhmaṇa learned in the śāstras' (Dharmasūtra, 13, 26) uses the very words of Bṛhaspati without mentioning his name ('pṛcchati iti prād; vivicya vaktīti vivākaḥ).

167. A similar use is made by Bṛhaspati, to suggest from the concluding prayer, which he who performs a śrāddha (ceremony to the names) utters, 'And, may my faith never disappear' ('śraddhā ca no mā vyagamat', p. 342, v. 109) that as faith (śraddha) is essential to a śrāddha, so it is so named because what is offered to the manes in it is offered with devout faith (śraddhayā dīyate yasmāt śrāddham tena nigadyate, p. 331, v. 36). The etymologies are indicative no less of Bṛhaspati's saturation in Vedic tradition than of his ingenuity. His attachment to tradition is so obvious, that his rules prohibiting the association of a Śūdra (who will not be conversant with tradition) as a sabhya (assessor) (p. 12, v. 72), and the interchange of duties and functions between the Śūdra and the Brāhmaṇa (p. 71, vv. 15-16), which might result in the corruption of tradition by its exposition by a Śūdra teacher not brought up in it, and even in its disappearance if the Brāhmaṇas give up the duty of teaching, may be explained as due to the conviction that in the interest of society everything should be done to preserve tradition and prevent its corruption or loss.

168. An effect of belief in karma is to emphasise individual responsibility. Society is believed to be preserved by maintaining the equipoise of duties between the several varṇas and āśramas, and by seeing that every man does his duty. This is why the king is enjoined to maintain every one in his appointed duty. Bṛhaspati makes 'purity' (śauca) depend on 'being fixed in one's own duty' (svadharme ca vyavasthānam śaucam etat prakīrtitam, p. 299, v. 495). Duties are inseparable from function no less than birth. Neither fear, nor self-interest (in a short-sighted sense) should stand in the way of one's discharge of his duty. This is particularly required of the Brāhmaṇa, who is to be an exemplar and teacher. He is not to be led away by cupidity or self-seeking into pursuits which are ruinous to his spirituality and character. By such surrender the Brāhmaṇa becomes a degraded being (caṇḍāla), in spite of his birth (p. 374, vv. 13–15). If he neglects to educate himself as he should, and plays the fool, the Brāhmaṇa loses the right to deference (p. 270, v. 275). The fearless and un-selfregarding pursuit of duty and righteousness is perhaps best illustrated by the stringent injunctions to assessors in a trial (and ministers) to restrain a king who is bent on wrong-doing by telling him the unpalatable truth, so as to save him from perdition and keep the assessors themselves from sin (na sabhyaḥ kilbiṣī tataḥ, p. 17, vv. 99–101). If the king persists in wrong, even after he is admonished by the advisers, the latter have done their duty and are free of blame.

169. Bṛhaspati's conservative disposition is also evidenced by his emphasis on acting in due accord with the sacred writings

(śāstra) and Vedic injunctions. 'The king is advised by learned men in ways shown by the śāstras' (p. 9, 52). 'The time for hearing suits by the king is best which is approved by the śāstras' (p. 10, v. 61). 'Those who have been divinely endowed with intelligence get over easily the cleverness of others, and pierce through the darkness spread by ignorance and transcend the obstacle placed by doubts (to get at truth). The assessor who restores health to the diseased (mental) eye by the ointment-applying needle of śāstra, obtains in this world both fame and royal rewards, and in the next salvation' (p. 16, vv. 96-97). 'The usages of the castes originating in improper unions (pratiloma-prasūta) and of hill tribes (durga-nivāsinaḥ) are to be carefully enforced according to the śāstras' (p. 22, v. 132). 'The assessor who abandons cupidity and dislike, and decides questions in issue in accordance with the injunctions laid down in the śāstras (śāstroditena vidhinā) obtains the same reward as he who performs a yajña' (p. 17, v. 98). In some places śāstra is used in the sense of dharmaśāstra (p. 39, v. 18, for the approval of the term sampratipatti for 'an admission by the defendant' by those learned in the śāstras). Similarly, in regard to the Vedas, the performance of the acts enjoined by the Veda is enjoined, and the omission to perform them day by day leads to rebirth as a caṇḍāla (p. 296, v. 476). The upākarma ceremony is enjoined by the Veda and it should be done when the sun is in Cancer (p. 262, v. 221). The capital of the king is to be filled with Brāhmaṇas who have mastered the Vedas and the vidyās (p. 6, v. 30). The defamation of Brāhmaṇas may be punished by the amputation of the tongue, even when done by one who is master of Vedic examples and is an instructor in law (p. 172, v. 18), a rule intended to bring out in the strongest manner the culpability of libelling Brāhmaṇas.

170. The atheist is reprobated. Those who are devoid of a knowledge of the śāstras are classed (to mark the heinousness of their ignorance or negligence) with the nāstika (atheist). Civil disabilities are attached to the manifest atheist. Though one may be presumably able to depose on local or caste usages, he cannot be questioned on them, if he is an atheist (p. 11, v. 64). The atheist is among the excluded classes who cannot be witnesses (p. 56, v. 40). The divine test or ordeal (daiva) cannot be offered to an atheist (p. 89, v. 68). The two last exclusions are intelligible, as obviously one who did not believe in post-mortuary punishments indicated in the oath taken before the court for perjuring himself cannot be deterred from telling falsehoods by the influence of the oath. An ordeal is a judgment of God and is inapplicable to those who question His existence. The heretic (pāṣaṇḍa) is one step below the atheist in culpability. Manusmṛti (IV, 61) refers to guilds of heretics (pāṣaṇḍa-gaṇa),[1] possibly an allusion to local Buddhist saṅghas. Yājñavalkya (II, 192)[2] provides equally for the recognition of the by-laws of orthodox Vedic (naigama) and unorthodox heretical (pāṣaṇḍī) gaṇas. Nārada (ed. Jolly, p. 163, v. 2)[3] and Kātyāyana (ed. Kane, v. 682)[4] repeat the rule in their own words. Kātyāyana's verse, as cited in the Smṛti-candrikā (III, p. 40), attributes the opinion to Bṛhaspati, from whom no other writer cites a rule of Bṛhaspati to this effect (the verse is not included in this collection). It is not possible to equate the term pāṣaṇḍa with Buddhist, though later commentators like Medhātithi and Kullūka (Manu, IV, 30) and Vijñānesvara, interpreted it as meaning one who rejects the authority of the Veda. There is no reference in Bṛhaspati to Buddhist thought, tenets or organisations.

171. This silence has to be explained. Bṛhaspati has enunciated eight virtues which every one should possess (sarva-sādhāraṇāni) and has proceeded to illustrate and explain what each of these virtues consists in (pp. 297–300, vv. 489–501). The number eight might suggest borrowing from the Buddhist 'noble eightfold path' by walking on which one gets nirvāṇa ultimately. The Buddhist virtues are the possession of right views, right aspiration, right speech, right conduct, right livelihood, right effort, right-mindedness, and right rapture. Summed up the list of Buddhist beatitudes amounts to this: the way to happiness and ultimate emancipation is 'to have a good heart and mind, taking shape in good deeds, and at last finding fulfilment in the rapture of ecstasy' (Sir Charles Eliot, Hinduism and Buddhism, 1921, I, 213). The eight virtues which Bṛhaspati would ask every one to cultivate are compassion (dayā), forgiveness (kṣamā), freedom from envy (an-asūyā), purity (śaucam), tirelessness (an-āyāsam), auspiciousness (maṅgalam), liberality (a-kārpaṇyam), and absence of desire (a-spṛhatvam).[5] The two are entirely different, though there is overlapping. It will be noticed that Bṛhaspati puts some of the virtues negatively, i.e. he suggests what one should not possess, such as desire, envy, covetousness, etc.

172. The insistence on the full ritualistic life, the quiet affirmation of the old rules, and the absence of even the occasional expressions of disapproval of an unorthodox creed like Buddhism, above all, the complete silence on the tenets and regulations of that powerful religion, might suggest either deliberate ignoring by a hostile writer, or a condition in which the struggle between Buddhism and Brāhmanism had at last been concluded by the defect of the former all along the line, and its displacement as a social and religious factor. This position was apparently reached only sometime after the reaction begun by Puṣyamitra and his dynasty in the second century B.C. Foreign rulers like Menander (Milinda) may have shown interest in Buddhism in the second century B.C. But it is evident that the successors of Kaniṣka were definitely Brāhmanical in their religious affiliations, and that, judging from the Besnagar inscription of Heliodorus, even in the second century B.C. a Brāhmanical cult of Viṣṇu (as Vāsudeva) was gaining a hold even on the Hellenistic settlers on the north-west frontiers of India. The strong Vaiṣṇava leanings in Bṛhaspati (e.g. pp. 307-308, vv. 546–555; p. 319, v. 67 on the harivāsara) are intelligible in the conditions of an epoch in which even foreigners accepted the Viṣṇu cult, and it is not permissible to reject passages which inculcate the Bhāgavata form of worship, as late interpolations, as has been done in the case of Viṣṇusmṛti, which, on other grounds, has been assigned to this period.

173. After the spread of Buddhism, the acceptance of the ascetic form of life, represented by the last stage of a Brāhmaṇa's life (sanyāsa) had become popular, on the various grounds on which monasticism thrives. To those brought up in Brāhmanic religion and discipline it seemed to show a way out. An easy sanyāsa for one who was unprepared for entry into it by self-discipline and spirituality was socially unwelcome. This must have struck Bṛhaspati, whose description of the conditions in which alone the āśrama could be entered on is unusually full and pointed (p. 305, vv. 532–538). The entrant into kaivalya-āśrama must have overcome desire and anger, recognised the insipidity (nis-sāram) of worldly life, become unrecollecting of pleasures enjoyed or wistful for joys to come, possess devotion (śraddhā), mental concentration (dhyāna), austerity (tapaḥ), purity of mind and body, and single-minded devotion to God. An easy approach to salvation or emancipation is not for one who would become a sanyāsin, when he is unfit, or for a man of 'cloistered virtue' who has not been schooled to self-mastery in the hard struggle of daily life.

174. What constitute the elements of dharma of the most import for this life and the hereafter? The answer is given by Bṛhaspati, in the spirit of ancient tradition, in four verses reproduced at the beginning of the samskāra section (p. 231) below. The study of the Vedas, the worship of holy men, the performance of the prescribed rites and sacrifices (yajña), and the acquisition of knowledge of the sacred writings and above all truth, are the things which constitute dharma of a fruitful kind in this life and after death. Truth, knowledge, austerities, and charity are the approaches to dharma. From duty (dharma) flow happiness and wisdom, and from wisdom release from the bondage of re-birth. Detachment from the objects of pleasure and constant introspection are, says Bṛhaspati (p. 231, v. 2), what make for the best for men, according to the sage Pancaśikha (Pancaśikho munih). 'Performance of tapas (austerity) is the primary duty (dharma) of the Kṛta-yuga, the cultivation of the knowledge of the teachings of the scriptures (jñāna) of the Tretā-yuga, the performance of sacrifices (ādhvara) of the Dvāpara-yuga, and the practice of charity (dāna), compassion (dayā) and restraint (damaḥ) of the Kali-yuga' (v. 4). The sentiments thus expressed have passed into currency as the common ethical thought of India. They indicate no special quality which can be regarded as individual and peculiar to Bṛhaspati.

175. The citation of the name of the sage Pancaśikha, as the authority for the sentiment that detachment from pleasure and spiritual concentration are best for men, raises the question of the identity of the sage, whose opinion is thus cited. Several of the name are known. In the early Buddhist texts a gandharva named Pancaśikha is mentioned as in the vicinity of the Buddha (H. Oldenberg, Buddha, p. 111). The Mahābhārata (XII, 220-221) describes a long philosophical colloquy between him and king Janaka of Videha. He is represented there as the son of Kapilā. The name is explained (ib., 220, v. 12) as due to his having bathed in five sacred streams (panca-srotasi), his having mastered the Pāncarātra, to his knowing the five (truths), his having accomplished the five (things to be done), and worn five braids of hair to symbolise these. There is a third Pancaśikha, who appears in the Sāmkhya tradition, after Kapila and Āsuri, and the epic makes Āsuri his teacher and foster-father. This attempt at identifying the epic sage with the Sāmkhya teacher is rejected by Keith, after an analysis of the known teachings of both. 'The system of Pancaśikha is developed in detail in XII, 219 (of the Mahābhārata); not only has it in detail no special connection with Sāmkhya, but in its fundamental principles, it is not Sāmkhya at all... Pancaśikha is truly Vedantic and not an upholder of the Sāmkhya at all' (A. B. Keith, Sāmkhya System, pp. 40-41). The epic derivation of the name from, among other things, his mastery of Pāncarātra, the source of the Bhakti cult centering round Viṣṇu, would confirm this rejection of the identity of the two Pancaśikhas. This is important, as the insistence on such doctrines as that 'knowledge and ignorance are the sole determinants of release from bondage' and of the need for absolute detachment, by Pancaśikha, the writer quoted in the Sāmkhya-kārikā (III, 30), might suggest a superficial resemblance to the ethical view cited by Bṛhaspati as that of the sage (muni) Pancaśikha. Keith holds the Sāmkhya Pancaśikha to be a historical person, to whom a date in the first century A.D. ascribed by Garbe (Sāmkhya Philosophie, p. 34) 'may be regarded as not excessively early' (ib., p. 43). If Bṛhaspati's allusion was to this person, then Bṛhaspati, who refers to Pancaśikha as a sage (muni) must be placed fairly long after the first century A.D. to allow of a philosophical writer becoming transformed into an ancient sage. The simple ethical view attributed to him by Bṛhaspati is more in line with his general outlook, as described in the Mahābhārata than with the developed Sāmkhya doctrines of the historical Pancaśikha.

176. Is there anything in the fragments of Bṛhaspati's smṛti to indicate the region to which he may have belonged? The evidence furnished by the fragments themselves may be stated. The famous verses beginning with the words 'eṣṭavyā bahavah putrāh yadyekopi Gayām vrajet', magnifying the sanctity of Gayā as the one holy place where the performance of a śrāddha brings mukti (release) to one's ancestors (pitaraḥ), which the Matsyapurāṇa quotes as anonymous gāthas, are attributed by the digests and commentaries to Bṛhaspati. In another verse, which is also ascribed to Bṛhaspati (p. 335, v. 65), the ancestors are said to long for the birth of sons, from fear of falling into hell for want of male descendants, since at least one of them might make the pilgrimage to Gayā and free them for ever (asmān tārayiṣyati) from this fear (v. 66). The birth of sons is lauded in another verse, because a son will effect the release of a bull (vṛṣotsarga), which will enable the spirits of the departed to cross the dread stream Vaitariṇī, in the other world, will perform the prescribed domestic and public sacrifices (iṣṭā-pūrta), will protect his parents in their old age, and perform funeral ceremonies for them (p. 335, v. 66). The mixture of the material and spiritual benefits anticipated from male progeny may be noted, as it is characteristic of Bṛhaspati. The 'undying' tree (vaṭa-vṛkṣa) at Gayā, and other holy sites in which, in the presence of an assemblage of Brāhmaṇas, the śrāddhas are done, are all mentioned in another verse (p. 336, v. 67). There is no reason to doubt the authenticity of the verses. The identical sentiments are expressed in Vasiṣṭhasmṛti (XI, 39–42), which is older than Bṛhaspati's work: 'The father and the grandfather, likewise the great-grandfather, beset a descendant who is born to them, just as a bird flies to a tree, saying "He will offer us funeral repasts with honey and meat, with vegetables, with milk and with messes made of milk, both in the rainy season and under the constellation Maghāḥ". The ancestors always rejoice at a descendant who lengthens the line, who is zealous in performing funeral sacrifices, and who is rich in images of the gods and (virtuous) Brāhmaṇa guests. The manes consider him to be their (true) descendant who offers them food at Gayā, and (by virtue of that gift) they grant him (blessings), just as husbandmen (produce grain) on well-ploughed (fields).'

177. Then, we have in Bṛhaspati's fragments laudation of certain tīrthas of North India. He who bathes thrice daily (tri-ṣavaṇa-snāyī) and dwells for three nights (tri-rātropoṣito) at the world-famous (lokaviśrute) confluence of the Aruṇā and the Sarasvatī is freed from all sin (p. 379, v. 44). The confluence takes place near Kurukṣetra, not for away from modern Delhi. The prescribed three daily baths and halt for three nights at the confluence of Gangā and Yamunā (the Ganges and the Jumna) at Prayāga (modern Allahabad) make one pure again after sins have been committed. Prayāga has been known as tīrtha-rāja (king of holy places). It is noteworthy that in the fragments of Bṛhaspati the description 'world-famous' (loka-viśruta), which would be applied to Prayāga, is used to describe the obscure confluence of the little stream Aruṇā and the now lost river Sarasvatī. Performing śrāddha or even seeing three holy sites in Gayā (Brahmāraṇya, Dharmapṛṣṭha, and Dhenukāraṇya) is said to raise up ancestors for twenty preceding generations (p. 333, v. 51). No other holy places are mentioned in the available fragments. The region in which the holy places mentioned are found extends from Delhi to Gayā.

178. In dealing with customs, which are repugnant to accepted dharma, but which have to be protected (pālanīya) in order that the people following them may not be disturbed in mind or become disaffected (p. 21, v. 127), Bṛhaspati recites some usages from different parts of India. From the context, it has to be gathered that the localities in which they were followed were not in his own province. The customs have to be treated as entitled to the same recognition as the family usages of persons born of pratiloma unions and of forest tribes (p. 21, v. 126), i.e. as inferior customs. Dharma being personal, not local, such ācāra (usage) must be applied to persons who follow them irrespective of their domicile. The customs thus catalogued as inferior are the marriage of a maternal uncle's daughter, which is practised even by the twice-born among the people of the Dakhan (dākṣiṇātyaiḥ), the eating of beef by craftsmen in Madhyadeśa, the eating of fish by persons of even the higher varṇas in the East (pūrvaiḥ), and the drinking of wine and the marriage with a brother's widow in the North (uttare). The fraternal polyandry of Tibet and the hill tribes of the Himalayas is probably what is alluded to. The indications might justify the conclusion that the area in which the author of this description of condemned usages lived is, by elimination, the Gangetic plain between Bengal and the Punjab, and between Central India and the Himālayas; and, within this region an area nearer to Kurukṣetra, forming the old Brahmāvarta, the sacred land of Manusmṛti (II, 17-18), 'which lies between the two divine rivers Dṛṣadvatī and Sarasvatī',[1] and the usage of which 'handed down in regular succession (since time immemorial) among the (four chief) castes (varṇa) and the mixed (races) of the region, is called the conduct of virtuous men' (sadācara ucyate). This is just the area in which the impact of the foreign raids, which began early in the second century B.C. and continued till the establishment of Kuṣan dominion, must have been most severe. It is the region in which one expects to find the cult of Viṣṇu as Vāsudeva-Kṛṣṇa to be well established in that epoch, so much so that foreigners accepted it, and it spread downwards into Rajputana, where we find epigraphic evidence of its prevalence in the mutilated Gosuṇḍi inscription (c. 200 B.C.) as well the Besnagar inscription of Heliodorus (Luders, List of Brāhmi Inscriptions, Nos. 6 and 669). It may be remembered that in enumerating the current coins (p. 81, vv. 8–10) Bṛhaspati uses neither the terms raupya for the silver kārṣapaṇa, which was, according to Nārada (p. 229, v. 57), the name used in the Dakhan for it, nor aṇḍikā, the name used in the Punjab. While he mentions the kārṣapaṇa for describing the scales of fines, which were reckoned in it (p. 82, v. 11), he uses the word kākaṇī, which Kātyāyana (v. 493) describes as a fourth of a paṇa, as well as the paṇa, as the usual money-gift (dakṣiṇā) in a śrāddha (p. 347, v. 136). Bṛhaspati's omission to mention the names of the coins ordinarily used in the Punjab and in the Dakhan would indicate that he wrote in and for persons, who were resident neither in the Punjab nor in the Dakhan.

179. It has been seen that Bṛhaspati follows in religious matters the lead of the older smṛtis. An apparent exception has to be noticed. Condemnation of suicide as a sin is common in arthaśāstra as well as dharmaśāstra. The Mahābhārata (III, 253, v. 2) condemns the soul of the suicide to hell, and to ill-fame (ātmatyāgī hi adho yāti, vācyatām ca ayaśaskarīm). Kauṭilya (IV, 7) lays down that the man or woman who committed suicide by a rope, weapon or poison, should be denied proper cremation rites (na smaśāna vidhiḥ teṣām) by relations (na sambandhikriyāḥ). The relations, who, in contravention of the law, perform the rites are liable to punishment and to be deprived of their right to teach, perform sacrifice and receive gifts. In later times, sati (sahamaraṇa or anvārohaṇa) was treated as an exception, but Bṛhaspati has in an ambiguous passage apparently allowed it. In the old dharmasūtras, those who had committed inexpiable sins, like killing a Brāhmaṇa or violating the Guru's bed, were asked, as the only method of expiation, to mutilate themselves, and walk facing south till they fall dead (Āpastamba-dharmasūtra, I, 9, 25, 1-2) or die embracing the heated metal image of a woman, or throw themselves, when they have killed a Brāhmaṇa, into a fire (Gautama-dharmasūtra, XXII, 2). Vasiṣṭha's teaching appears contradictory. In treating of the different ways of obtaining great results, he states (XXIX, 4) that 'by entering the fire the world of Brahma is gained' (agnipraveśāt brahmalokaḥ). Bühler (p. 136n. of S.B.E., XIV) regarded this sūtra as of some importance as it sanctioned self-cremation and explained the Greek accounts of Brāhmaṇas who visited Europe and cremated themselves. On the other hand, when dealing with penances (XXIII, 14–16) Vaṣiṣṭha explicitly condemns all forms of suicide: 'For him who committing suicide becomes an Abhiśasta, his blood relations (sapiṇḍa) shall not perform the funeral rites. He is called a suicide who destroys himself by means of wood, water, clods of earth, stones, weapons, poison or a rope. Now they quote also (the following verse): "The twice-born man who out of affection performs the last rites of a suicide, shall perform a cāndrāyaṇa penance together with a tapta-kṛcchra".' Bṛhaspati's rules on the treatment of suicide seem to follow almost with verbal fidelity the rules of Kauṭilya and Vasiṣṭha, but with one marked omission. He declares (p. 385, vv. 84-85) that the corpse of the suicide, who has taken away his life by poison, the noose or a weapon, should be covered with ordure, as it does not merit any other kind of preparation (samskāra). He who cuts down the rope by which a man has hanged himself, he who carries the body (to the cremation ground) and he who puts the fire on the corpse, all can be purified only by a heavy penance (ati-kṛcchra) 'So also the worst among men, who offers piṇḍa to the spirit of the suicide.' Bṛhaspati omits to mention suicide by drowning. The omission is probably intentional. If a reason may be sought for the omission, it may be found in the custom of suicide by drowning at the confluence of the Ganges and Jumna at Prayāga, which was supposed to lead the suicide straight to heaven, in accordance with a verse in the Ṛg-Veda (Khila., X, 75, 1) which described how one who sank himself where the white river (the Ganges) and the dark (the Jumna) mingled their waters, sprang straight into heaven, and how the courageous men who abandoned their mortal body thus, are known to attain immortality.[1] An ancient custom, sanctified by Vedic sanction, and followed in his own country could not have been openly condemned by Bṛhaspati.

180. There is another associated matter in which Bṛhaspati's position needs elucidation. The treatment of vānaprastha-dhārma (duty of hermits) is hardly distinguishable from that accorded to the rules of sanyāsa. Complete detachment from all worldly affairs and thought (kaivalya) being the common feature of both the āśramas, he describes as the preparation for both the kaivalyāśrama (p. 305, vv. 532 et seq.). The meditation on the Supreme Being and the ascetic mode of life are stated in common terms for both, with special signification of the matters peculiar to the yati (ascetic), as distinguished from the hermit (vānaprastha) (p. 306, vv. 543-544). Manu has elaborate rules distinguishing the hermit and the ascetic (VI, 2–33 for the hermit's rules, and VI, 34–86 for sanyāsins). In one respect a marked distinction is made by Manu (VI, 31), and following him by Yājṇavalkya (III, 55).[2] The hermit is enjoined by Manu 'to walk, fully determined and going straight on, in a north-easternly direction, subsisting on water and air, until his body sinks to rest'. The same injunction is repeated by Yājṇavalkya: 'subsisting on air he (the hermit) may go on travelling towards the north-east, until his body is destroyed'. The process of dissolution thus indicated is termed mahāprasthāna and the classical instance is its essay by the Pāṇḍavas and Draupadī. The effect of such a death is thus stated by Manu (VI, 32):[3] 'A Brāhmaṇa, who gets rid of his body by one of these methods practised by the sages is exalted to Brahmaloka (world of Brahmā), free from sorrow and fear.' Such a death is not permitted to the members of the last order. To the sanyāsin Manu (VI, 45)[4] expressly interdicts even the wish for death. 'Let him not desire to die, let him not desire to live; let him wait for (his appointed) time, as a servant (waits) for his wages.' The sanyāsin who 'leaves this body, (be it by necessity) as a tree (that is torn) from the river bank, or (freely) like a bird (that) quits a tree, is free from the misery (of the world, dreadful like) a shark. Making over

(the merit of) his good actions to his friends and (the guilt of) his evil deeds to his enemies, he attains the eternal Brahman by the practice of meditation' (VI, vv. 78-79). The difference between the destiny of the hermit, who voluntarily seeks death in the mahāprasthāna, and the sanyāsin, who allows death to overtake him, should be noted. The first attains Brahmaloka, and the second attains Brahman. The first is not the real goal, while the second is, because it means emancipation. This distinction is elaborated by Medhātithi, in order that the inferiority of voluntary death, which is opposed to Vedic precept, might be seen (ed. Jha, I, p. 506).

181. What are 'the methods practised by the sages' (maharṣicaryāḥ) by which the hermit seeks, in the alternative to the mahāprasthāna, release from the sufferings of this existence? These are named by Medhātithi as drowning oneself in a river (nadī-pravesa), falling down headlong from a cliff (bhṛgu-prapatana),[1] self-cremation (agni-praveśa) and death by starvation (ahāra-nivṛtti). Among these, starvation as a means of release from the mortal coils is recommended in the Jaina scriptures (H. Jacobi, Jainasūtras, S.B.E., XXII, pp. 68–78, XLV, p. 24). It is noteworthy that no precept of Bṛhaspati has been found recommending mahāprasthāna, or any of the four 'recognised' means of self-extinction, named above, and no precept condemning them. To do the first would be to endorse suicide which he abhorred in all forms; to condemn methods sanctified by the action of sages, and advocated by Manu would be impious. A way out, as in the case of the explanation of the contradictory rules of Manu on niyoga, was not available. The theory of the decadence of spirituality and power from yuga to yuga, which Manu (I, vv. 81–86) describes, and which he apparently applied to his disapproval of niyoga (IX, vv. 66–68), and which Bṛhaspati endorses (p. 194, vv. 16-17), was apparently not yet fully established. Mr. P. V. Kane conjectures that the theory of decadence was being gradually 'perfected during the five or six centuries preceding Christ, when the great schism due to the genius of (the) Buddha spread over India'. Bṛhaspati does not use the later theory that certain practices, which were good enough to follow in former yugas, are impracticable in this yuga and must therefore be regarded as interdicted for the Kali-yuga (kalivarjya). The kalivarjya doctrine, which led to the prohibition of about fifty old practices in course of time, developed after the fourth century A.D. and found expression in the purāṇas and the later versified smṛtis.[1] Its absence in Bṛhaspati, or at least its presence in a mere germ, reflects an epoch far removed from even the periods in which the mahāprasthāna and the vānaprasthāśrama were ruled out as kalivarjya. He has not found the means of rejecting the two institutions which he disapproved of, as, in their case, a loop-hole was not supplied, in the case of niyoga, by Manu himself. His silent disapprobation must have strengthened the movement for their rejection, and his argument against niyoga suggested the doctrine, which later on developed into the theory of kalivarjya.

182. A brief reference is due to the prevalent views of the date of Bṛhaspati's code, to judge of their validity in view of the discussions in the previous pages. Bühler conducted an exhaustive review of the subject, in relation to Manusmṛti. He properly regarded Bṛhaspati's work as intended to be a vārttikā on the Manusmṛti, and therefore later than that work (Laws of Manu, p. cviii). He held the date of Bṛhaspati to be circumscribed by his mention of the dīnāra on the one hand and on the other by his citation by the nibandhakāras from the ninth century A.D. onwards, when it was regarded 'as a work of divine origin, revealed by the teacher of the gods' (p. cx). 'Hence Professor Jolly's supposition that it must have existed some two or three hundred years earlier, places it, not too early, but, in my opinion, rather too late.' Earlier in his discussion Bühler stated that Bṛhaspati was 'considerably later than the beginning of our era' (p. xvii). In his Digest of Hindu Law, he was not quite certain of the authenticity of the passage containing the name dīnāra. 'If the verse of Bṛhaspati (about it) is not a later interpolation, the smṛti cannot be older than sixteen or seventeen hundred years' (p. 44, 4th edn.). A similar doubt of the authenticity of the śloka in which the name of this coin occurs in Nāradasmṛti has been expressed by Meyer (Rechtsschriften, pp. 103ff.). Bühler's later opinion put the upper limit at about A.D. 200. Jolly, in introducing his translation of his collection of Bṛhaspati's fragments on vyavahāra (in 1889), concluded that the earliest date for the composition of the book could not be pushed behind the first century A.D. when the earliest Indian coins corresponding to the 'gold denarius' of the Roman (sic) came into use (p. 275), and that its composition cannot be referred to a later period than the sixth or seventh century A.D. (p. 276). Though on the ground of Bṛhaspati's greater affinity to Manu's views, an earlier date might be attributable to his work than to the Nāradasmṛti, Jolly held that 'the enlightened views of Bṛhaspati on the subject of women's rights, and the advanced character of his teachings generally, render it probable that his learned composition belongs to a somewhat more recent period than Nāradasmṛti' (p. 275). In the English version of his Rechte und Sitte (Strassburg, 1896), which he revised (1928), Jolly was more definite. He held to the view that Nārada was earlier than Bṛhaspati, but 'yet, there is no great distance of time between Nārada and Bṛhaspati' and 'Bṛhaspati should be assigned to about the sixth century or the seventh century A.D., because already from the ninth century upwards he is quoted by the commentators as an inspired seer' (p. 57).

183. Mr. Kane approaches the question from a different angle. He accepts the sequence Manu, Yājñavalkya, Nārada, Bṛhaspati, Kātyāyana. The date of Kātyāyana must therefore furnish the lower limit. Both Viśvarūpa and Medhātithi, who flourished in the first half of the ninth century A.D., regarded him as a great smṛti writer like Yājñavalkya, Nārada and Bṛhaspati. 'This position he could not have attained in a century or two. Hence, Kātyāyana cannot be placed later than 600 A.D. As Kātyāyana is later than Yājñavalkya, Nārada and Bṛhaspati, he could not have flourished before the third or fourth century A.D. Therefore, the smṛti of Kātyāyana must be placed between 300 and 600 A.D.' (Kātyāyanasmṛtisāroddhāra, 1933, p. xvii). 'That Kātyāyana looked upon Bṛhaspati as a model and as an author whose dicta were entitled to respect follows from several verses of Kātyāyana' (p. xi). He should have regarded Bṛhaspati as 'an author who flourished several centuries before' (Hist. of Dharmaśāstra, I, p. 211). 'Therefore, Bṛhaspati cannot be placed later than the fourth century A.D. As he knew the extant Manusmṛti, was later than Yājñavalkya, and probably than Nārada, Bṛhaspati must have flourished between 200 and 400 A.D.' (ib., p. 210). This conclusion is restricted to the vyavahāra content of Bṛhaspati, for, according to Mr. Kane (op. cit., p. 126) the verses on prāyasccitta and ācāra, which are cited as from Bṛhaspati, belong to an independent work composed between 300 and 500 A.D. Mr. Kane holds that it is not possible to determine whether the same Bṛhaspati wrote the sūtra works on Arthaśāstra and Dharmaśāstra ascribed to him, though he inclines to the belief in their being composed by different authors (p. 125). He admits that Viśvarūpa considered that the verses on vyavahāra and prāyasccitta which he cited from Bṛhaspati, along with some sūtras, were from one and the same work. Yājñavalkya's reference to Bṛhaspati as an earlier writer on Dharma is taken by Mr. Kane as probably a reference to the above work on Dharma.

184. It may be convenient to state here succinctly the results of the review of the evidence in the previous pages. The name of Bṛhaspati, the preceptor of the gods and the Vedic sage, was associated with the authorship of an authoritative exposition of Arthaśāstra, to which probably the name added glamour. The doctrines embodied in this work were developed by students who accepted it, and their tenets came to be known, in the fourth century B.C., as those of the 'school of Bṛhaspati' (Bārhaspatyāḥ). The Kauṭilīya cites the views of this school (and not the teacher Bṛhaspati) seven times. At the time, both Arthaśāstra and Dharmaśāstra were accepted as valid guides for conduct and as having canonical authority, and were treated as complementary and as having a common aim. They had also some common topics and material. The Gṛhya and Dharmasūtras, which were used as manuals in oral exposition by teachers following different caraṇas, furnished scope for the composition of works which dealt dharma in relation to artha, which did not affiliate themselves to any specific caraṇas, and which depended for their popular reception on their own merits and the reputation of their authors. A feature of the new type of work was the freedom it gave for criticism by one work of this class of the views contained in other works of the class. These works were also in sūtra form originally, as a convenience for oral exposition, but divergence in exposition even within a school, and the appeal which this class held to a wider audience than a Vedic school, stimulated the composition of comprehensive works, in which both the old sūtra and its exposition would be rendered by the same author. This is illustrated in the Kauṭilīya, in which both the sūtra and the bhāṣya are supplied by the same author, Kauṭilya. The newer class of Arthaśāstra writings, though nominally in sūtra form, contained verses also, and their fulness and comprehensiveness made them serve the purposes of study better than the older sūtra books, which were designed as aids to memory in oral exposition. A corresponding change was taking place in the same epoch, in which the old dharmasūtras, which were specially adapted for oral instruction in specific caraṇas, gave place to more comprehensive works in verse and prose, which, while nominally appearing attached to a particular Veda, held a wider appeal, and still later to samhitas or collections of Dharma, which used the verse exclusively as the medium of expression. The original Viṣṇusmṛti and Mānava-dharmaśāstra (before it took its final shape) represent the two stages of this change. The growing dharma element derived from the oral exposition of the dharmasūtras which the more comprehensive treatises on Arthaśāstra came to contain is paralleled by the incorporation of much artha material in the newer dharmasamhitas, like the Bhṛgu recension of Manusmṛti and Yājñavalkya- smṛti. The original text-book of the school of Bṛhaspati, which Kauṭilya knew, apparently passed through these stages, building on the old core of Bṛhaspati's sūtras, and amplifying its range and content by drawing on floating dharma material, like other dharma and artha writings, till it took a definitive form as a comprehensive treatise on all parts of dharma (vyavahāra, prāyasccitta and ācāra) like the Bhārgava recension of Manusamhita to which it tended to adhere most closely, in view of the reputation and authority that Manu's work had gained. Every work of this period on dharma essayed the same task of being self-contained and comprehensive, like the codes of Manu and Yājṇavalkya. There is no valid reason to doubt that from the time of its taking shape as a work on dharma, the code of Bṛhaspati had this character. It remained virtually unaltered, till chance additions came to be made in the fourth or fifth century A.D. to its text, in the form of explanatory or amplificatory material, borrowed mainly from the new knowledge of astronomy.

185. The affiliation of the code of Bṛhaspati to that of Manu has to be treated as a connection with an older text of the latter than the one which has survived and become standardised. The common passages in both codes, and between them and other codes need not be explained necessarily or with close approximation to probability, on the hypothesis of borrowing one from another, as a common source existed in a vast body of anonymous verses on dharma topics in circulation and available to all alike. The arguments by which the posteriority of Bṛhaspati's code to the code of Yājṇavalkya, which contains a reference to the former, which is not easily explained away, is upheld, are weak, and are largely based, like the similar assertion of Nārada's smṛti being earlier than Bṛhaspati's, on ill-founded generalisations and a priori assumptions. Bṛhaspati's work stands in point of time closer than Yājṇavalkya's to the earlier form of the present recension of Manusmṛti. It is also earlier than Nāradasmṛti, in any of its extant recensions. It is admittedly earlier than Kātyāyana's smṛti, which cites it with the respect due to an old authority. A specific teaching of Bṛhaspati is cited in Nāradasmṛti under a name suggesting that of Bṛhaspati. It is not certain that Kātyāyana, who has no reference to Nārada, while constantly referring to Bṛhaspati, is not earlier than Nārada, who has generally been placed before both Bṛhaspati and Kātyāyana. The law and procedure described in the Arthaśāstra of Kauṭilya are fairly elaborate and well developed. If judicial institutions and legal procedure persist, with minor variations, dictated by local or personal preferences, and are described more or less fully in smṛtis, a similarity in such descriptions or approximations in their statements of doctrine, cannot validly establish a rough contemporaneity in the smṛtis concerned. The inference of Nārada and Bṛhaspati being of almost the same period or generation is largely based on the above assumption, and it cannot be applied against a revision of the usually accepted sequence of the three writers.

186. The internal evidence of Bṛhaspati's smṛti fragments suggests: (1) close approximation in time to the composition of the Bhārgava recension of Manusmṛti, (2) an epoch in which Brāhmanical teachings had regained their former prestige and influence and the contest with Buddhism had spent itself, (3) a period of military conquest and occupation by persons of an alien race and culture, leading to numerous acts of violence against women especially, so as to create a problem in the rehabilitation of outraged women, (4) a time of extended commerce, leading to the prolonged absence or disappearance of men engaged in distant trade, (5) an epoch in which the cult of Vāsudeva-Viṣṇu and old Vedic sacrifices were popular even among foreigners, (6) and a milieu of corporate activity, monarchical government and the falling into disrepute of old institutions like the third āśrama, the appointment of widows (niyoga), the self-immolation of widows (sati) and time-honoured forms of suicide. It indicates also conditions in which succession by primogeniture to thrones might be advocated and the improper marriage of a brother's wife or widow might be held up to scorn, without running the risk of exciting royal displeasure, if not condign punishment. Like Manu's famous condemnation of the Licchavi tribe, as the descendants of impure and outcaste (vrātya) Kṣatriyas, (X, 22),[1] which could not have been uttered when kings who gloried in their descent from this race were emperors of North India, from the fourth century A.D. onwards, the public enunciation of these opinions by Bṛhaspati postulates a pre-Gupta epoch. There are indications of non-Kṣatriya kingship in Bṛhaspati's smṛti. All the evidence is one-pointed and tends to place most of the extant fragments of Bṛhaspati, considered as parts of a dharmaśāstra, bearing his name, in the second century B.C. This is the upper limit which Bühler assigned to the extant Manusmṛti (Laws of Manu, p. cxvii). Bühler's date is itself largely the result of conjecture on different types of evidence. Some readjustments in the dates of the Mānavadharmaśāstra and of the law-books of Yājñavalkya, Nārada and Kātyāyana will be necessitated by the acceptance of this estimate of Bṛhaspati's date. But to indicate all the repercussions of the conclusion to which the available evidence points as regards the time when the laws of Bṛhaspati took more or less the form suggested by the surviving fragments, will take one far out of an enquiry restricted to Bṛhaspati. The validity of the conclusion cannot be impugned by reference to the time-context of words or names, like those of week-days, the dīnāra, and terms suggesting Greek astronomy; for, the result is obtained from an appraisal of several independent lines of evidence furnished by the content of the smṛti, and it cannot be upset by anything which is not proved to be an authentic part of the smṛti, as it stood when it took more or less its present form as a dharmasamhita, and which might be a later interpolation, in one of the successive revisions to which books, whose text does not become fixed by authoritative commentaries, are liable.

187. There is no tradition of any commentary on Bṛhaspati's work, like Asahāya's bhāṣya on Nāradasmṛti. The omission can be explained on different grounds. Bṛhaspati's work was itself virtually a running comment by a traditionalist and jurist of learning, and forensic experience and humanity, on the code of Manu. Its value in elucidating and supplementing Manusmṛti will diminish when authoritative commentaries, more directly explaining and completing Manu's text, came to be written by scholars like Asahāya and Medhātithi (Kane, Hist. of Dharmaśāstra, I, pp. 248-249). A book which professedly models itself as a vartikā must yield place to bhāṣyas, in the course of a natural evolution. Bṛhaspati's fulness of treatment of Vyāvahāra is equalled and often surpassed by Nārada and Kātyāyana. The latter will tend to supersede him in the attraction to those who require the fullest treatment of vyavahāra. On individual topics, many later minor smṛtis will excel his work. With the multiplication of smṛtis arises the need for synthesis of doctrine. We come to epochs in which this need is met first by smṛtisamgrahas (like Medhātithi's lost work, the Caturvimśatimata and the Ṣat-trimśanmata) and afterwards by nibandhas (digests) in whose shadow smṛtis are eclipsed. Like flies in amber, fragments of smṛtis come to be conserved in digests and bhāṣyas, but for survival as wholes, they must depend upon chance, in a country whose vicissitudes make it a matter for surprise not that ancient works of merit have been lost but that even a few of them have survived. Luck may still lead to the discovery of a manuscript of the authentic code of Bṛhaspati, as the Institutes of Gaius were revealed in 1821, and manuscripts of the Kauṭilīya came to light in recent years. But till then the discriminating student of Dharmaśāstra, who can perceive in them a wise conservatism tempered by realism and humanity, such as one may expect from a scholar, a sage and a jurist, may be content to make the most of even a conjectural reconstruction of the lost code from the scattered fragments of Bṛhaspati's famous Smṛti.

ADDITIONAL TEXTS

The following are also attributed to Bṛhaspati in different nibandhas. They mostly came to view after the text had been sent to the press. They are accordingly collected below, and in each instance both the source of the passage and the possible location within the text of the smṛti, as reconstructed, are indicated.

(1) From Viśvarūpa's Bālakrīḍā on Yājñavalkya-smṛti (ed. Trivandrum), p. 184.

To come at the end of p. 7 of the text, with the heading अमात्यादिलक्षणम् .

To come after व्यवहार, I, 130 (p. 21) of the text. These verses are not ascribed to Bṛhaspati in Smṛticandrikā, the only nibandha in which they have been found; but, they were incorporated by Jolly as 19–24 in the concluding chapter (XXVII) of the reconstructed Bṛhaspatismṛti he translated (pp. 389-390, S.B.E., Vol. XXXIII). In a footnote, Jolly said: "These texts will be published elsewhere. They have been taken from the Saṃskāra Kāṇḍa of the Smṛticandrikā, where they are quoted from an uncertain author. 20 has been printed as a text of Brihaspati in Professor Bühler's Ujjvala, p. 101. The term 'Pārasīkas' denotes the Persians or perhaps the Parsis of India".

The second śloka below (referred to by Jolly as "20" is to be found in the second edition of Bühler's Āpastamba-Dharmasūtra (B.S.S.), part I, p. 102. It is not found in most manuscripts of Ujjvalā and is rejected in Prof. Chinnaswāmi Śāstrī's edition of the work, p. 290, though the inclusion in Bühler's edition is drawn attention to in a footnote.

SELECT OPINIONS

Sylvain Levi: The Gaekwad's Series is standing at the head of the many collections now published in India.

Asiatic Review, London: It is one of the best series issued in the East as regards the get up of the individual volumes as well as the able editorship of the series and separate works.

Presidential Address, Patna Session of the Oriental Conference: Work of the same class is being done in Mysore, Travancore, Kashmir, Benares, and elsewhere, but the organisation at Baroda appears to lead.

Indian Art and Letters, London: The scientific publications known as the "Oriental Series" of the Maharaja Gaekwar are known to and highly valued by scholars in all parts of the world.

Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, London: Thanks to enlightened patronage and vigorous management the "Gaekwad's Oriental Series" is going from strength to strength.

Sir Jadunath Sarkar, Kt.: The valuable Indian histories included in the "Gaekwad's Oriental Series" will stand as an enduring monument to the enlightened liberality of the Ruler of Baroda and the wisdom of his advisers.

The Times Literary Supplement, London: These studies are a valuable addition to Western learning and reflect great credit on the editor and His Highness.
